PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 98th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE—Thursday, April 26, 1984

(Legislative day of Tuesday, April 24, 1984)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

In a moment of silence, let us remember President and Mrs. Reagan in China.

(A moment of silence was observed.)

Father in Heaven, we thank Thee for the blessing of Senator Jacob Javits' presence with us yesterday. His words resonate in my heart as I compose this prayer. He said, "We need to pray because without it, we would be tyrants or fools." Thank Thee for the wisdom of years and experience with which this beloved Senator speaks. May we take seriously his counsel.

Almighty God, often in this place the Senators find themselves in the vortex of cosmic issues upon which hangs, not simply the common welfare, but the survival of the human race. Help the Senators to accept their inadequacy and need for divine intervention. Help them to see issues from above rather than from within—so they can separate the urgent from the essential—the trivial from the important. Give them grace to "do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God." (Micah 6:8). In His name and to His glory we pray. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

FORMER SENATOR JAVITS—AN INSPIRATION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I commend the Chaplain once again for the insight and sensitivity of his prayer this morning.

Let me say that I had the occasion to visit with our former colleague, Senator Javits, on the day before yesterday. I am sure all Members here will understand and appreciate the spirit in which I make the next statement and that Senator Javits will as well.

As I sat there next to him—he in his wheelchair, with an electric respirator breathing for him—I began to think that my jet lag from my return trip from the Orient was of such small consequence. And I felt guilty for arising that morning feeling tired and really not wanting to come to work compared to how Jack Javits must feel when he gets up in the morning faced with the terrible physical infirmities that he has.

But after I got past that, I realized that he was talking to me very directly and very seriously about a most important and intricate issue as he proceeded to talk about possible amendments to the War Powers Act. He looked me straight in the eye and said, "Howard, I understand you want to amend the War Powers Act." I said, "Yes, I do. I think that there are defects that we should address that have evolved and developed since it was passed and which were not contemplated."

And then he proceeded to speak in the most eloquent, the most intelligent, and the most incisive way that you can imagine. I have seldom heard such insightful and appropriate analysis of any statute as I heard from this man, sitting there in his wheelchair with his respirator, wheezing away.

So Jack Javits' mobility is gone, his ability to breathe on his own is gone, but there is not one scintilla of damage to his marvelous brain nor to the spirit that drives him.

So I commend the Chaplain for his remarks this morning because his allusion to Senator Javits as an inspiration to all of us is most appropriate indeed and I resonate to it in a most personal way.

(Mr. MURKOWSKI assumed the chair.)

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the four Senators who have special orders have concluded, we will have morning business this morning until 11:30 a.m., and then resume consideration of the pending unfinished business. At last count last evening, there were 20-plus amendments known on the minority side and 26 amendments on the majority side, which is mildly embarrassing to me since it is our bill and my amendment. I thought rather highly of it, as a matter of fact. Then to find that 26 amendments are to be offered by my colleagues on this side of the aisle, disputed, at least, the total adequacy of my legislative initiative, and was humbling.

But in any event, Mr. President, the reason for the inventory was to see whether it was possible to get a unanimous-consent agreement that would provide for time limitations on the amendments and a time for final passage of this bill.

I would still like to do that. But I must say in all candor that chances for doing that are less than 50-50 in my opinion, even though eight of the amendments on this side fell by the wayside last evening or before we convened today.

So as of now there are 18 amendments that we know of on this side of the aisle and 20-plus and growing on the other side of the aisle, in the words of the minority leader spoken to me privately before we began.

In view of that, Mr. President, I think it is very likely that the Senate will be in session tomorrow and we will just continue to plow through this matter. I still hope we can get the unanimous-consent agreement as I described it.

Let me describe it again. I would like to see us get a unanimous-consent agreement that would provide that only certain amendments would be in order, those listed, and no other amendments would be in order except the listed amendments, that there be time agreements on each of them, a time agreement on the bill itself, and a time for final passage.

There are other matters that I have discussed with the minority leader, such as advanced arrangements on how to deal with the Budget Resolution Act. I would like to do that, if it is desirable. Mr. President, I hope we can work something out along those lines. But if we cannot, we cannot. We still have to do this bill, and I told the press this morning that I thought it would be sometime next week before we finished. Indeed, I am afraid it will be next week. That does include a session on Friday, unless extraordinary circumstances deliver us from that.

Let me say on the matter of the Friday session that I wish to announce now that we will be in on Friday. If there is any change in that, I will make that announcement before 1 o'clock today so that Members can make their plans accordingly. But, unless there is a change in plans by 1 o'clock today, the Senate will be in session on tomorrow.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. President, while I am on this subject, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 10 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, once again I thank the Chaplain for his prayer. I apologize to the minority leader for these rambling remarks, and if I have time remaining, which I believe I do not, I will offer it to the minority leader. But in any event, I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

TRIBUTE TO FORMER SENATOR JAVITS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader never rambles in his remarks. I am the greatest rambler of all. He speaks succintly, cogently, and persuasively. I sat, and I listened to him as he talked about our former colleague, Senator Jake Javits, whose name was mentioned during the prayer by our beloved Chaplain. I recall an occasion last year—it may have been the year before last—when both the majority leader and I were in New York City to be present on an occasion in which Senator Javits was being publicly honored, and deservedly so.

As the majority leader described his recent occasion in meeting with Senator Javits, I then recalled those same moments last year when we were with Senator Javits. At that time, I marveled at the courage of this man, the strength of his convictions and the clearness of his mind. In 24 years in this body, I have never seen any individual who in my humble judgment—which perhaps should not be called upon publicly because it may be subject to question—but at least in my judgment no one's brilliance in this Chamber in my 26 years has excelled that of Senator Javits. And in my judgment, again, which is certainly ordinarily subject to question, I have seen few whose brilliance exceeds his. The courage of this man under the terrible affliction which he has had to bear is inspirational.

The majority leader said something else about those who have physical problems. I suppose similar ones will come to all of us, if the Lord lets us live. We all want to live, to get old, and at the same time we do not want to suffer afflictions that come with getting old.

From time to time I go to the School for the Deaf and the Blind in Romney, W. Va., and the superintendent will call an assembly of students. There they are. The deaf students will be leading the blind students; or two students, perhaps one entirely blind, another almost entirely blind, will be walking hand in hand. And at the assembly, upon introduction of a visitor, the applause of those students is deafening. As I watch them walk around, leading one another, their faces appear so free of care, and their faith high. They talk so cheerfully, and they do not seem to have a problem in the world.

And those of us who have a few aches and pains, I guess, and some minor problems, go out sometimes with long faces, sort of indulging ourselves and pitying ourselves and feeling sorry for ourselves. I expect, if we looked at almost anyone else, we would not want to change our own troubles for his or for hers. But I suppose that just points to the smallness of ourselves.

There is a poem: I would like to stand aside and watch myself go by. I think that would be, quite often, good for me. So often I have thought about the Moon and wished that I could go to the Moon, look back and see this planet Earth, and, thus, realize how infinitesimally small I am, how little the significance of my own being is, and how my self-importance is so highly self-inflated.

"Today, upon a bus, I saw a lovely maid with golden hair,
"I envied her, she seemed so gay, and I wished I were as fair.
"When suddenly she rose to leave, I saw her
hobble down the aisle;
"She had one foot, and used a crutch, but as she passed, she had a smile.
"Oh, God forgive me when I whine; I have two feet, the world is mine."

With those thoughts, I begin to sort of feel deflated and that is the way it should be. When I sum all of that up, I come to the conclusion that my importance and my influence in this world are about like that of a drop of sand in the Potomac, and create just about that much of a ripple and will endure about that long.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. First of all, I was not able to hear the distinguished majority leader on this, but I want to tell the leaders that I was privileged to be present when Senator Javits testified. I was so deeply impressed. What a marvelous, marvelous human being he is. All of us recognize the extraordinary intelligence and the greatness of knowledge that Jake Javits has on every kind of a subject. But his testimony was really heroic. Here was a man barely able to talk, and he told us about the ravages of this disease. And he appealed to the appropriations subcommittee so eloquently. I will never forget it. It was as profound an experience as I have had since I have been in this body.

I apologize to the leader for mentioning this, but I cannot resist pointing out that the real hero in my view of fighting for the Genocide Treaty was Jake Javits. Nobody worked harder for that. Nobody feels more deeply that we should ratify that convention. If we should ratify it—and I am convinced that this administration will support it—I think Senator Javits deserved the great bulk of the credit for our doing so.

THE DEATH OF DAVID KENNEDY

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, we are saddened today by yet another tragedy for the Kennedy family. Our hearts go out to the family of our former colleague, Senator Robert Kennedy, and of Senator TED KENNEDY, a family which has borne so much pain, and so much suffering, with strength, and with grace, and with abiding faith.

Anyone's death diminishes us all, but the loss of a young person is especially humbling. David Kennedy, only 28 years old, reminds us of the promise of youth. That promise is fixed in our minds in David's case by the memory of the vitality and energy of his father, who had such a zest for life, and a passion for trying to make a better world.

How precious our days, how limited our time, and how indiscriminate is the hand of fate. We are forcefully reminded once again of the mortality of us all.

Mr. President, I join with the distinguished majority leader who spoke yesterday, and with all Members of the Senate, in extending our sincerest sympathy. My wife Erma joins me in extending sympathy to TED KENNEDY and all the members of his family.

It may be of some small comfort for them to know that their loss has deeply moved us all.

AFGHANISTAN: SOVIET BOMBER ATTACKS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, my colleagues are well aware of my long-standing concern for the fate of the brave people of Afghanistan. I do not know that I have a single Afghan constituent. I may have or I may not have. On many occasions, I have addressed the Senate on the progress of events in that war-torn country, which the Soviet Union continues to occupy after more than 4 years. I have recounted stories of the courage and determination of the Afghan freedom fighters in their struggle to liberate their country. Because of Soviet censorship, news about that struggle is sometimes very hard to come by, and I am disappointed that we see so little reporting on this tragedy.

Over the past few weeks, stories about Afghanistan are back on the front page of the papers. Unfortunately, this latest news is of a new all-out Soviet offensive to destroy the villages and rebel strongholds north of the capital city of Kabul. Two recent reports from the Washington Post reveal that the Soviets have engaged heavy bombers against the Afghan population in the hope of breaking their will. Judging from the past, this sort of massive retaliation will do more to fortify the determination of the Afghan resistance than anything else. The Soviets should expect the same reaction to these massive bombing raids as was seen in Britain during the bombing attacks on that proud country during World War II.

The Washington Post reports that the Soviets have tried and failed six times to take the strategic valley north of Kabul away from the rebels. Apparently, they now have decided to bomb it into oblivion. The use of these heavy bombers against civilian positions is an unspeakable act of brutality. But it serves to point up the desperation that the Soviets now feel. Desertions from the Afghan army of the Soviet puppet regime have increased to such an extent that the Soviets now draft members of the privileged Afghan Communist Party in the hope of suppressing the resistance. At the same time, the ranks of the resistance have swelled to an estimated 100,000 freedom fighters. The Soviets are losing control of the entire country, and they know it. I am talking about the entire country. I am not talking about the capital city of Kabul. What they cannot control on the ground, they are trying to destroy from the air.

The bankrupt strategy of the Soviet occupation is taking a serious toll on Soviet credibility and manpower. And it exacts a terrible price from the people of Afghanistan. But the Soviet treachery and brutality in that country is accomplishing little, if anything. The Soviets have neither advanced their interests in the region nor secured their southern border. In terms of their own priorities, they have failed in Afghanistan. As has been the case throughout the history of that country, the invaders will be forgotten but the courage of the Afghan people will endure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two articles from the Washington Post titled "Soviets Use Bombers in Afghanistan" and "Soviets Bolster Afghan Force," an editorial from the New York Times of Thursday, April 26, titled "Remember Afghanistan," and I praise that newspaper for repeatedly running editorials with reference to the brave fighters in Afghanistan and the brutal invasion by the Soviets; and also a story that appears in that newspaper today by Drew Middleton titled "Afghan Rebels Are Said To Flee Valley."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOVIETS USE BOMBERS IN AFGHANISTAN—MAJOR OFFENSIVE LAUNCHED AGAINST REBEL STRONGHOLD

(By Fred Hiatt)

The Soviet Union has launched a major new offensive in Afghanistan, for the first time using heavy bombers against the rebels in an effort to take a stronghold that has resisted six previous Soviet campaigns, administration officals said yesterday.

The pounding by Soviet Tu16 Badger bombers began Saturday morning and continued through the weekend, officials said. A column of 20,000 Soviet and Afghan army troops with 600 to 800 vehicles is now moving north through the Panjshir Valley, an area that has continued to resist communist control.

U.S. officials said the latest offensive in the Soviets' four-year effort to control Afghanistan is likely to result in high casualties on both sides, with civilians suffering most from the high-altitude bombing.

The new tactics appear to escalate a trend in which the Soviets, frustrated by the stalemated war, have resorted to heavier attacks on population centers from helicopters, ground attack planes and now bombers.

In attacking the Panjshir, the Soviet Union is going after one of the prime rebel strongholds and the most renowned guerrilla commander, Ahmed Shah Massoud. Massoud, who has been called the Che Guevara of Afghanistan, may have provoked the offensive when his men recently blew up two bridges north of Kabul, the capital, officials said.

But if Massoud's action dictated the timing of the offensive, the Soviet Union had been building up to it. During the past several weeks, the Soviets increased their troop contingent in Kabul and deployed about 100 bombers on their border with Afghanistan.

The Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in December, 1979, and installed a friendly government in Kabul. But much of the countryside has remained hostile to the Soviet occupiers and the Afghan army that supports them, with the Mujaheddin—as the Afghan rebels are called—waging a war of attrition that seems to have grown more effective during the last four years.

The Soviets have stationed more than 100,000 troops in the country and 30,000 more along the border. They have used Mi24 Hind helicopter gunships extensively, but until this weekend had refrained from the kind of high-altitude, widespread bombing that the United States used in Vietnam in an attempt to demoralize enemy forces.

On Saturday, however, the Soviets sent about three dozen medium-range Badger bombers and a probably larger number of Su24 Fencer fighter-bombers from bases along the border to attack the Panjshir Valley. The bombardment was followed by close-in attacks from ground attack planes and helicopters, plus heavy artillery shelling, officials said.

Massoud has established a primitive resistance government in the Panjshir, and about 10,000 rebels are said to be ensconced there, many in caves along the valley's sides.

Massoud's rebels took advantage of a semi-official truce with the Soviets last year to fortify gun positions and ammunition stores deep in the mountains, which is why U.S. officials predicted that the Badger bombing would harm villages more than Mujaheddin positions.

By early yesterday, a column of Soviet and Afghan troops reportedly had advanced as far north as Rokheh, which the Soviets had occupied for about 10 months two years ago but had abandoned under pressure from the Mujaheddin. Officials were making no predictions about how long this offensive would last.

"This is the largest attempt to go in there," one official said. "But they'll have a hard time getting them [the Majaheddin] out of this valley."

"The Soviets as of now, after six tries, don't control the valley," another official said. "But we can't say what their goals are—whether they want to burn crops, or kill Massoud, or control the valley."

Officials also did not say how many of the attacking troops are Soviet. The Soviet Union has tended to let the Afghan army do much of the ground fighting, while the Soviets fly some aircraft and operate some of the tanks and other heavy vehicles further to the rear.

SOVIETS BOLSTER AFGHAN FORCE—BOMBERS NEAR BORDER

(By Fred Hiatt)

The Soviet Union has stationed about three dozen medium-range bombers at airfields near its border with Afghanistan, presaging a possible new phase in the war against Afghan guerrillas, administration officials said yesterday.

U.S. officials cautioned that they are uncertain about the significance of last week's deployments, which included 36 Tu16 Badger bombers and about 100 lighter bombers and ground attack planes. The movement could be intended as a signal to Pakistan or connected to events in the Iran-

Iraq war, since the Persian Gulf is within the 1,200-mile range of the Badgers.

But the officials said they believe the deployment of the planes, accompanied by support aircraft and large amounts of munitions, indicates the Soviets may be planning large-scale aerial bombing as part of their expected spring offensive in Afghanistan. Helicopter gunships have been used extensively in the war, but until now the Soviets have not engaged in the kind of high-altitude, widespread bombing that the United States used in Vietnam in an effort to demoralize the enemy.

The Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in December, 1979, and installed a friendly government. Since then, Moslem "freedom fighters" in the countryside have stubbornly resisted the Soviet presence, forcing the Soviets to commit more than 100,000 troops to the mountainous country and station another 30,000 along the border with Afghanistan.

The Soviets also appear to be flexing their military muscles in another part of the world, Pentagon officials said yesterday. Twice in the past two weeks the Soviet navy has staged amphibious landings on the Vietnamese coast, the first time Soviet marines have operated in that part of the world, they said.

A Pentagon official said the amphibious landing exercises are another indication, following the deployment of a helicopter carrier to the Caribbean, of the Soviets' willingness and ability to project force far from its borders.

The most recent exercise, about 90 miles south of Haiphong, involved a 14,000-ton Ivan Rogov class amphibious assault ship, the 38,000-ton helicopter carrier Kiev, several support ships and 400 to 500 Soviet marines.

"The Soviet Union, for decades a continental military power, now possesses an increased capability to transport personnel, arms and equipment to any area of the world," the Pentagon said last week in its latest edition of "Soviet Military Power."

Critics have suggested that the Pentagon exaggerates Soviet capabilities to help convince Congress to appropriate large sums for U.S. defense. Many of those critics acknowledge, however, that Soviet "power projection" has increased in recent years.

In Afghanistan, one Defense official said, there had been indications even before the deployment of bomber aircraft that the Soviets might be planning "a little tougher" spring offensive this year. "They may just be getting tired of it," the official said, noting that the Soviets are estimated to be spending $1 million each day and to have lost several hundred helicopters.

But another official said there was some doubt about the usefulness of aerial bombing, since the guerrillas do not concentrate in large groups. The Badgers were deployed along with about 36 Su17 Fitters, ground attack fighters roughly comparable to the U.S. A7 Corsair, and about 60 Su24 Fencers, which compare with U.S. F111 fighter-bombers.

REMEMBER AFGHANISTAN

While the United States tinkers with mines in Nicaragua, the Soviet Union is ripping Afghanistan apart. America's offenses in Central America are relentlessly exposed by an inquisitive Congress and public; yesterday's state secret is tomorrow's leak. No wonder American leaders are tempted to envy the Soviet Union its freedom to deploy force beyond its frontiers. Envy not such butchery.

The latest, murderous offensive in the Panjshir Valley, 50 miles north of Kabul, exposes the horror. This is the Russians' sixth attempt to "pacify" the region, and follows a one-year truce with the rebels. Saturation bombing has destroyed villages suspected of sheltering guerrillas. It is said the offensive employed 14,000 troops, 250 tanks, 150 armored personnel carriers and up to 80 helicopter gunships. This is no "contra" skirmish, but full-scale war against tribesmen armed with antique weapons.

So Afghanistan is still not pacified after all. In five years of direct occupation, the Soviet Union has yet to broaden the appeal of its puppet regime. Most of the countryside remains in the control of insurgents. Three regimes in Moscow have been unable or unwilling to negotiate a face-saving withdrawal on lines proposed by a United Nations negotiator. Perhaps they really believe the nonsense that only help from the West through Pakistan keeps the angry rebellion alive.

To believe that is to ignore Afghanistan's history of passionate resistance to every invader. Afghans look upon Russians not only as foreigners but also as infidels, and take up their arms for both nation and Islam. Even if the Soviet brutality prevails, it can give powerful impetus to Islamic fundamentalism throughout the region. This is indeed a no-win war.

For all the disarray caused by open debate in a free society, Americans are gaining a clear understanding of their frustrations in Central America. The tribalism that produces rebels in Afghanistan works the other way in Nicaragua, where rebels associated with America or, worse, the despised Somoza dictatorship, have yet to win control of a single town. And unlike Afghanistan's Marxists, the Sandinistas are confident enough of their support to arm large numbers of their own people.

To debate the similarities and the all-important differences is not a weakness but a corrective. It may hinder decision-making of the moment but provides long-run assurance that foreign policy, and particularly military ventures, will be tested by the evidence of their consequences.

No such test is possible in the Soviet Union. Its bloody squirming in Afghanistan is less an advertisement of its strength than an indictment of its weakness.

AFGHAN REBELS ARE SAID TO FLEE VALLEY

(By Drew Middleton)

Western intelligence sources said yesterday that Afghan guerrillas were withdrawing into the mountains from the valley stronghold in which they were hard hit Tuesday by Soviet and Afghan Government forces.

The sources said the rebels were being attacked by Soviet Su-24 planes.

Afghan refugee spokesmen in Pakistan ridiculed a claim made Tuesday by the Soviet-supported Government of Afghanistan that the attacking forces had scored a decisive victory in the 50-mile-long Panjshir valley, which runs northeast from a point 50 miles north of Kabul, the Afghan capital. But rebel groups in the battle zone appeared to take a different view.

Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, leader of Hezb-i-Islami, a fundamentalist Moslem group, instructed his forces to support the rebels of Ahmad Shah Masood, who were forced to withdraw into the mountains. Intelligence sources said this was significant because the two groups had been bickering ever since Mr. Masood concluded a truce with the Soviet-Afghan forces last year.

FUNDAMENTALISTS GET ORDERS

Mr. Gulbuddin, according to British sources, ordered his Hezb-i-Islami guerrillas to expand their operations against Soviet-Afghan positions at Jabal-us-Siraj and Gulbahar. These places are on the main supply route from the Soviet Union at the mouth of the Panjshir valley and serve as staging areas for operations by the Soviet-Afghan forces.

British and other North Atlantic Treaty Organization intelligence sources said they viewed the size and speed of the Soviet-Afghan operations in the Panjshir valley as a sign that the spring and summer would be used to intensify activity against the guerrillas.

NATO intelligence sources estimate that the Soviet forces in Afghanistan have lost 5,000 dead in combat and from illness and 10,000 wounded since they intervened in December 1979. These losses, the sources said, are unlikely to cripple the total manpower of 1,800,000 in the Soviet Army and are lower than the United States Army suffered in a comparable period in Vietnam.

Soviet losses from illness, the sources said, have fallen in the last 18 months because higher standards of sanitation have been adopted and base hospitals have been established.

10,000 CLEARED FROM VALLEY

The operation in the Panjshir valley was intended to clear the area of 10,000 guerrillas who used to attack convoys on the supply route from the Soviet border town of Termez and, occasionally, raided the Bagram air base used by Soviet transport planes and helicopters.

Western intelligence sources said they thought the Soviet forces now faced the problem of maintaining the momentum of the Panjshir operation. The informants said this could mean the diversion of other units of the 108,000-man Soviet force in Afghanistan for other operations.

At present the Soviet commanders are said to deploy no more than 20,000 soldiers and airmen against the guerrillas while the remainder of the force carries out exercises.

In view of Soviet supremacy in the air, intelligence sources said, the Russians are likely to use their medium bombers and ground attack planes more than they have in the past. The guerrillas have no planes and their antiaircraft resources are negligible.

Experts on the Soviet home front's reaction to the Afghan operations suggest that the internal political problem may prove to be more difficult than the tactical problem in the field.

Moscow acknowledges, one source said, that the impact of losses on the civilian population cannot be hidden. But accounts of casualties are rare in the Soviet press and, when they are printed, the dead are portrayed as heroes.

Soviet publications have begun describing conditions in the field. Krasnaya Zvezda, the army newspaper, took the unusual step in late February or reporting an attack on a Soviet supply convoy. The next day it described an attack on a Soviet airfield.

A British source said these Soviet press developments have been accompanied by tougher language describing the guerrillas as "terrorists" and "bandits" and asserting that an ultimate Soviet victory is inevitable.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR EVANS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Washington (Mr. EVANS) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

COMMENDATION OF THE LEADERSHIP

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, may I say first, while the majority and minority leaders are in the Chamber, that I find that neither of them ramble during their morning business. They conduct it well. I enjoy listening, whether from this floor or from the office, to each of them each day. I find it most elucidating. It is a pleasure each morning to hear from both of them.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. EVANS. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I will be brief.

The Senator from Washington was on the floor last evening when we recessed and he made similar remarks about having enjoyed the concluding business of the Senate. Now he is on the floor at the beginning of the session today, which puts him in a small and select group. Ordinarily, only the minority leader and I are here at the beginning of the day and the end of the day, which has prompted a remark from time to time that the principal duty of the leadership is janitorial. We are the first here and the last to leave.

The complimentary remarks of the Senator from Washington will be brought to the attention of my wife, and I am sure it will change her mind on the importance of the job that the minority leader and I have to perform.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I join in the remarks and associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished majority leader. I am extremely grateful for the overly charitable comments in my direction by the distinguished Senator from Washington. It is very helpful on a new and bright spring day. I suppose the three of us are joined by the Presiding Officer in quoting someone who once said, "Oh, to be in England when April's there." But it is not so good as being in West Virginia when April's there.

Mr. BAKER. Which is only exceeded by being in Tennessee.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I intend to leave this weekend to beat both the majority and the minority leaders by being in the State of Washington.

DEFICIT REDUCTION PROPOSALS

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the bipartisan 1-year freeze deficit reduction proposal. I wish to compliment my colleagues, Senators KASSEBAUM, GRASSLEY, BIDEN, and BAUCUS, for their leadership in the development of this most attractive deficit reduction package. I not only rise in support but am proud to be a cosponsor in that effort.

Since taking my seat in the Senate last September, I have listened, learned, and I hope constructively participated in the budget deficit reduction in this Chamber. It is clear to me that action to reduce budget deficits is a top priority for each Member of the Senate.

I have indicated on numerous occasions, both to my colleagues and publicly, that I intend to vote for the package proposed by the President and by the leadership, but I also intend to vote for other balanced proposals which will do an even better job.

I think it is incumbent on each Member of this Senate to seek to do the maximum, for only the maximum will be effective in gaining the goals we seek.

Two major questions are before us in this debate: What level of deficit reduction should be sought? In a longer range, what framework should guide us toward the ultimate goal of a balanced Federal budget?

Responding to those two questions, I should say at the beginning that I do not believe that the current proposal of the President and of the leadership is adequate to do the job. It may be a first step, but it is only a modest first step.

Let us examine these questions in light of some of the following facts: The annual interest payment on the Federal debt is expected to reach $116 billion this year. It is 13 percent of the total Federal budget and it is growing.

To put it in perspective, this is substantially greater than what we will pay during the same period for medicare and medicaid combined.

The Federal Government has a good many additional financial problems which are just beginning to surface, and for which no current solution is in prospect. We must search for measures to cure a $500 billion unfunded liability in our Federal Civil Service Retirement System. We must examine options to slow the growth of medicare expenditures, which reflected 7 percent of total Federal outlays in 1982 and is expected to reach 10 percent in 1988. This, too, is an element of the Federal budget which continued to grow. Further, the medicare hospital insurance fund deficit is expected to reach $200 billion by 1995.

Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker recently said that the Federal deficits are a real and present danger to our economic recovery. We are all pleased in this Nation by the strength and continuity of our current economic recovery. As responsible representatives of our people we must insure that we not take action which will hamper that economic recovery. The prime rate of interest is now a full percentage point higher than a year ago and it appears to be headed even higher. For recovering industries, particularly such as housing and timber in my home State of Washington, this could end up being a severe setback. For other industries in other States that have yet to show renewed health during this economic recovery—for instance, agriculture—this faltering of a recovery and a return to excess interest rates would mean disaster.

Senator DOMENICI and his Budget Committee, I believe, have worked heroically to conduct the budget process given to him by Congress in as good a manner as possible. Nonetheless, Congress has been unable to operate in a timely fashion under our current budget process and there is a real question whether Congress truly has the procedural tools necessary to responsibly meet the budget needs of this Government and to effectively handle the budget deficit problems.

During the past 5 years, not only has Congress been unable to pass the 13 appropriations bills within the Budget Act deadline, but all 13 were not even passed by the end of the fiscal year they were intended to fund. In spite of that failure, I do commend Appropriations Committee Chairman HATFIELD and his committee. Fiscal year 1984 appropriations represented the best record of recent years.

We came closer than we have, but we still fail to do what the Budget Act calls upon us to do: That is to prepare and present to the Federal Government and to the people of this Nation a completed appropriation before the beginning of a fiscal year. During the past 5 years, Congress has not even been able to meet the deadline for the passage of the first budget resolution. For the past 3 years, the second budget resolution has been adopted more than 2 months after the September deadline, and well after the fiscal year for which it was intended.

Mr. President, I suggest that these facts lead to some initial proposals and some initial required answers. Deficit reduction must be immediate and substantial, and it also must initiate a downward trend for future-year deficits. I believe very strongly that a budget process must be established that provides Congress with the procedural tools to responsibly reduce deficits and work toward rationality in our budget activities. Therefore, I believe very strongly that we must move forward and not work with imaginary or, as some would suggest, "voodoo" deficits—deficit figures that do not really project our true problem, not project the true representation of what we propose in our action. We are all aware of the creative baselines currently being used by both parties to measure the level of 3-year deficit reduction, suggesting that we are doing more than we actually are.

Admittedly, projecting levels of inflation and interest rates and unemployment and the gross national product for 3 years ahead is a risky business. The best of our economists and econometric models seldom can make that prediction accurately. But I suggest that it is then all the more important for us to use conservative figures for those projections and not the super optimistic predictions used by some in creating rather creative baseline projections.

We are a long way from a balanced budget, Mr. President. If we have conservative predictions for future inflation, interest and gross national product growth rates and if we end up doing better, that is a bonus. But if we make predictions which are almost certainly unattainable, we and the people of this country will be sadly disappointed, even if we succeed in a modest deficit reduction program. So we must look beyond the simple 3-year reduction figures which have been tossed around and move toward sizable and immediate deficit reduction and initiate a sharp downward trend for future years.

Over the past 6 months, I have suggested a simple solution to our burgeoning deficits which reflect many of the comments made by my colleagues. That is simply that we must all work together, with everyone sacrificing something, to realistically stop the growth and begin to reduce the Federal budget deficit. I respectfully submit to my colleagues that with the bipartisan 1-year freeze, we have a balanced and simple start to rid us of these troublesome deficits.

Mr. President, let me focus on a few additional characteristics of the 1-year freeze that may prove to be attractive. First, I believe that it is fair. An across-the-board freeze would require that nearly every American share part of the burden for controlling the deficits, for virtually every American will share in the benefits which come from reduced deficits. No one would receive more, or less, than they do right now. Persons newly eligible for Federal benefits would get them, but benefit levels would be frozen for all, with no exceptions. For our elderly citizens, immediate action to reduce the deficit should result—and I strongly believe will result—in lower interest and inflation rates. That has a direct, decisive impact on the cost of food, energy, and shelter, which are the major elements of these persons' income. Lower inflation rates, incidentally, when you think about it, are a nontaxable benefit. No tax is taken from the benefits accruing from lower prices. This benefit then spreads to all sectors.

We constantly hear requirements for real growth in defense expenditures, for instance, and there are varying figures of real growth as opposed to current dollar growth in defense expenditures. But that comes in two ways: It comes from the budget dollars which are appropriated, but it also comes from the purchasing power of those budget dollars. What we can buy for our military establishment as well as all other functions of the Federal Government is as much determined by future rates of inflation as by new budget authority.

The freeze does maintain our commitments. With a freeze of budget authority in defense spending, actual outlays will continue to grow by $18 billion.

This suggests that with budget authority at fiscal year 1984 levels, most past commitments remain in place while new efforts are rethought or rescheduled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 15 minutes allotted to the Senator from Washington has expired.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, let me use 15 seconds of that to say I am still being arrested in my flight from the Chamber by the remarks being made by the distinguished Senator from Washington. They are excellent. They are exceptional. Indeed, they pose the problem that we are going to have to resolve one of these days on the budget process. That, succinctly stated, is whether or not the democratic process in which we participate has the courage, the stamina, the determination to do the difficult things necessary to right our fiscal plight. I believe those challenges are well stated by the Senator, and I applaud him for it.

Mr. EVANS. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

In addition to the simplicity, balance, and equity presented by a 1-year freeze, it provides substantial immediate savings—$22 billion more than the leadership plan in fiscal year 1985, and if you assume growth equal to inflation thereafter, $90 billion greater savings over a comparable 3-year period.

Emphasis must be placed on 1-year savings in light of the usual 3-year approach to deficit reduction, because of the historical tendency of Congress to load 3-year plans with heavy future savings and optimistic economic assumptions which seldom materialize. The response of the financial markets to favorable action on this plan should be immediate and I believe dramatic. By sending a clear signal that we are ready to address—rather than finesse—deficits, we can demonstrate the fiscal responsibility necessary to insure continued economic prosperity.

Mr. President, the bipartisan 1-year freeze proposal provides an ideal opportunity to not only address deficit reduction, but initiate more effective budget procedures.

Our distinguished colleague from Delaware (Mr. ROTH) has introduced the Budget Reform Act of 1983, an excellent piece of legislation.

The Budget Reform Act proposes procedural changes that will help rationalize the budget process. This act would establish a 2-year budget cycle, where budget and appropriation activities are restricted to the first nonelection year of the 2-year period. In addition, the act would establish more realistic budget and appropriation timeliness; allow Congress to address more nonbudgetary issues of national importance and provide for greater consideration toward more informed decisions, especially during the second year of that cycle when Congress would have what it desperately needs—an opportunity for more significant oversight of current activities we have authorized in past years; and it would assist State and local governments in coping with uncertain and flexible Federal budget processes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the June 19, 1982, Washington Post article authored by Mr. ROTH appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, June 19, 1982]

THE POST IS ALL WET

(By William V. Roth)

In its June 14 editorial on the budget process ["Budget Questions: Reform"], The Post seems to suggest that the way for Congress to prevent the budgetary chaos of recent months is not to change the procedures, but to stop being so political. That's like telling people to deal with air pollution by not breathing.

There's no question that the Budget Act of 1974 was a major improvement over what had been a haphazard and virtually uncontrollable process. But in the last few years, the new process has resulted in constantly missed deadlines, duplication of effort, and the need to "reinvent the wheel" every time a budget resolution, authorization measure, appropriations bill, continuing resolution or debt-ceiling extension comes along.

Our preoccupation with budget issues leaves little time for other legislation, not to mention oversight of the executive agencies. To the public, Congress seems hamstrung by its own procedures and unable to cope with the urgent problems of the nation.

The need for reforms in the federal budget process seems clear. Here are some of the most important:

First, the government should shift from a one-year to a two-year budget cycle, to begin on Jan. 1 of even-numbered years. As our experience last year and this has shown, setting national priorities through the budget process is too time-consuming and too politically charged to be accomplished in a few weeks at the beginning of each year—especially election years. Congress should pass a single, binding budget resolution by May 31 of every odd-numbered year, setting revenue and spending levels for the following two-year budget cycle. This step would streamline the process and make Congress more accountable to the public for its budgetary decisions.

Second, we should consolidate the 13 separate appropriations bills into a single two-year appropriation. This bill, as well as authorization measures, would be passed by Oct. 15, leaving the second year of the cycle free for new authorization and deauthorization bills and oversight.

Third, reconciliation of appropriations with outlay levels established by the budget resolution should be in order at any time after passage of the budget resolution. This would let Congress adjust spending priorities to meet changing economic and social conditions while remaining within the overall spending targets set by the budget resolution.

Fourth, revisions in the budget resolution to allow for economic emergencies or other unforeseen circumstances should be discouraged by requiring such changes to receive a two-thirds vote in both the Senate and House. This would make it much easier for Congress to reconcile appropriations with budget ceilings by a reordering of priorities—that is, by increasing funds for some programs while reducing funds for others—than by raising spending levels. In my view, this is the only way to impose real fiscal discipline on a Congress that has repeatedly demonstrated its inability to balance the federal budget.

Fifth, we should end the deceptive practice of funding some federal activities "off budget," exempting them from competition with other government functions for available resources. This proposal will elicit howls of pain from those who are receiving preferential treatment in the allocation of federal funds. But fairness, not to mention honesty with the American public, demands that we stop playing games with the taxpayers' dollars and start dealing with all government expenditures in a unified budget.

These proposals have been incorporated in S. 2629, the Budget Reform Act of 1982, which I introduced in the Senate this week. I believe these reforms are essential if we are to prevent the budget process from collapsing under its own weight. The alternative would be more budgetary debacles like this year's—and is an alternative that the American people simply will not accept.

Mr. EVANS. It is clear that we could move toward short- and long-term fiscal responsibility, first by accepting the 1-year freeze deficit reduction proposal and, second, by committing ourselves to refine and establish a more effective budget process. Whatever immediate political pain may ensue will be far outweighed by the national fiscal health we can help insure.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

TAKING NUCLEAR ARMS RACE INTO SPACE SHARPLY INCREASES CHANCES OF NUCLEAR WAR AT MULTI-BILLION-DOLLAR COST

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the two hottest concerns of the American people at this moment are the threat of nuclear war and the colossal deficits that threaten to cripple our economy. We in the Congress will be called upon to decide a little later this year whether or not to spend $2 billion next year and $24 billion over the next 5 years for research on an antiballistic missile defense. Obviously, Mr. President, we should spend whatever it takes to protect this country against the ultimate tragedy of a nuclear attack. But there is every reason to believe that the following disastrous results will follow a decision to fund this part of the administration's military budget. First, we would increase, not decrease, the danger of nuclear war. Second, we would end up spending not $24 billion but hundreds of billions, perhaps more than $1 trillion, on such a system. Third, it would almost certainly fail to work. Fourth, to the extent that it did somehow succeed, it would greatly reduce our deterrent capability.

Mr. President, this "Star Wars" defense is dead wrong on two counts. First, it makes a profound military mistake. It assumes that a superpower today can prevent or even win a nuclear war by relying on defensive military measures. It ignores the obvious fact that ever since World War I, more than 65 years ago, technology has overwhelmed the most elaborate military defenses. In the 1930's, the French built their "impregnable" Maginot Line with the firm assurance that that elaborate series of heavily armed pill boxes, organized to maximize crossfire and defeat the most determined onslaught, would frustrate the most determined kind of German assault. But what happened? The Germans hit the defenses with blinding speed in a blitzkrieg attack and simply waltzed around the famed Maginot Line.

Again, 12 or 14 years ago, both the United States and the Soviet Union seemed well on their way to the construction of antiballistic missile systems very similar to the antimissile defenses the Reagan administration now wants to fund. I vividly recall the Senate floor debate on funding that antiballistic missile system. Critics of the system at that time contended that any ABM system we could construct, no matter how brilliantly conceived, deployed, and operated, could be easily defeated at a fraction of the cost of the defensive ABM system. At that time the going estimate was the expenditure of $1 on offense could overwhelm $10 spent on any defensive weapon designed to stop nuclear missiles. The surprise, the mobility, the choice of timing for attack, the level of attack—whether from a high altitude or hugging the ground or even from ground-transported weapons—all of these elements would favor the offense. Furthermore, the offense could pour in successive waves of missiles in an endless series until the defense was exhausted. In addition, in a military milieu in which technology changes swiftly and drastically, even the most elaborate kind of defense against nuclear attack could be overcome at any time with an equally elaborate offense and at a fraction of the cost.

Second, the "Star Wars" defense is wrong because it strives to achieve peace by extending an arms race that simply cannot be won. What is worse, it accelerates an arms race that not only fails to build national security but literally contributes to insecurity. We will end up spending hundreds of billions of dollars and find ourselves less safe.

At the beginning of this speech, I warned that any success this expenditure achieved would simply reduce and maybe destroy deterrence—the basis of our security in this nuclear world for the past 30 years. How could this happen? Here is how: Suppose we found that the Russians were on the verge of some kind of magical breakthrough that would render our massive nuclear deterrent capability useless. What would we do? Would we quietly accept world domination by the Soviet Union and an end to our freedom? What do you think? Put it the other way. Suppose the Soviet Union found that the United States was succeeding in building a truly effective antimissile system that made all their missiles useless. What would they do? Would they seriously consider a preemptive strike before we had put the final touches on our "Star Wars" defense? Of course, they would.

Above all, if this Nation mistakenly proceeds down this path, we would obviously violate the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972. We would greatly dim the prospect of effective arms control agreements any time in the foreseeable future. We would be taking a long and tragic step toward a nuclear holocaust.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article that appeared in the Christian Science Monitor on March 22, 1984, and headlined "Star-Wars Defenses: Too Costly, Can Be Overwhelmed, Study Says," by Brad Knickerbocker be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Mar. 22, 1984]

"STAR-WARS" DEFENSE: TOO COSTLY, CAN BE OVERWHELMED, STUDY SAYS

(By Brad Knickerbocker)

A group of distinguished scientists and nuclear strategists warns that trying to defend the United States against ballistic missiles would cost hundreds of billions of dollars and be extremely vulnerable to overwhelming attack.

In a report released yesterday by the Union of Concerned Scientists (UCS), these experts examine in detail each segment of proposed mutli-layered defense against attacking missile warheads and the advanced technologies involved. In essence, they say, it won't work.

Their conclusion is even more sobering: It would "radically transform the context of US-Soviet nuclear relations, setting in motion a chain of events and reactions that would leave both superpowers much less secure. Deterrence would be weakened and crisis instability increased. Damage-limitation would be undermined by a greater emphasis on the targeting of cities. . . ."

Among those contributing to the report are: Hans Bethe, Nobel Laureate in physics who worked on the Manhattan project; Peter Clausen, a former Department of Energy and CIA analyst; Richard Garwin, a nuclear strategist and Pentagon adviser; retired Adm. Noel Gayler, former director of the National Security Agency; and physicists Kurt Gottfried of Cornell University and Henry Kendall of MIT.

In a dramatic speech a year ago this week, President Reagan called for research into a system that would render attacking nuclear missiles "impotent and obsolete." The Pentagon wants to spend some $2 billion next year on such research, a sum that Reagan administration planners say will increase to $24 billion through 1989. Officials see this as a hedge against Soviet advances in ballistic-missile defenses, as well as a counter to Soviet strategic weapons which capitalizes on a US lead in most of the sophisticated technologies involved.

Intercontinental ballistic nuclear weapons would take about 30 minutes to travel between the Soviet Union and the United States. Experts divide this flight path, and the areas in which defenses might be deployed, into three tiers: the boost phase, or first several minutes when the rocket engine is firing; the midcourse phase, in which the warheads, decoys, and other devices have separated from the missile and are flying ballistically in an arc outside Earth's atmosphere; and the terminal phase, when the nuclear warheads are streaking back down through the atmosphere toward their targets.

The Soviet Union now has about 1,400 ICBMs. Once launched, they could release tens of thousands (perhaps hundreds of thousands) of warheads and decoys, thus presenting an extremely difficult challenge to a defender, who would have to assume for most of their flight time that each was a nuclear weapon. Therefore, most experts say any successful defense would have to concentrate on the boost phase, when the missiles' rocket plumes are easily detectable and during which there are relatively fewer targets to defend against.

Some analysts say this would not be too difficult. In a new book, former Defense Intelligence Agency director Daniel Graham (a retired Army lieutenant general) claims that "within five years, at a cost of $12 billion, the United States could deploy a two-layered fleet of satellites [firing interceptor rockets] that would filter out 98 percent of a Soviet missile launch.

But this is a distinctly minority view not shared even by those who support the President's program.

The UCS experts examine the laser, directed energy, and kinetic energy defenses being studied by the Pentagon and conclude that none could work sufficiently to prevent many warheads from reaching US targets. Each is vulnerable to attack or "spoofing," they say, and it would be easier and cheaper for the USSR to expand its strategic forces than it would be for the US to counter them. "I would far rather be on the side of penetrating this ballistic missile defense than on the side of building one that works," Dr. Garwin told reporters yesterday. He and the others recommend a research effort more modest than planned by the Reagan administration.

The authors warn that deploying (or even testing in space) a missile defense system would violate the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972 and that broader nuclear arms control efforts would collapse. They urge "equitable and verifiable deep cuts in strategic offensive forces and immediate negotiations to ban all space weapons."

THE LANGUISHING PERSECUTION OF THE BAHA'I FAITHFUL

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, because of the numerous letters I continue to receive and the articles which continue to be written about the plight of the Baha'i faithful, I am compelled to once again bring to your attention the meaningless persecution of this peaceful religious group.

The constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran, which recognizes and protects the Jewish, Christian and Zoroastrian minorities, denies recognition to the Baha'is, though they are the country's largest religious minority. As a result, the Baha'is are deprived of legal protection and have repeatedly been used under the law as a focus for public grievances during constitutional unrest.

The tolerant and peaceful nature of the Baha'is has further encouraged their attackers, who know that they need fear no violent retaliation. Since the revolution of February 1979, over 150 Baha'is have been reported executed and another 500 are in prison without having been charged. Between 5,000 and 10,000 Baha'is are believed to have fled the country.

Baha'is property has been confiscated, and the Baha'is themselves are prevented from holding employment. Converting to Shia Islam is the only way they can escape persecution.

Mr. President, the lengthening grip of intimidation, imprisonment, and torture which the Iranian authorities have devised for their country's Baha'i faithful has to be recognized and the Baha'is basic international human rights have to be restored.

Our present administration has repeatedly voiced its commitment to the restoration of all peoples' human rights, and its denial of the persecution of people worldwide. For example, on April 30, 1981, at a "Day of Remembrance" ceremony for Holocaust victims, the President departed from his prepared speech with the improvised pledge that:

I intend that (the Presidency) shall be used on every occasion . . . to point the finger of shame . . . wherever it takes place in the world against the act of violence or terrorism . . . (and) the persecution of people for whatever reason . . . that it is a matter to be on the negotiating table or the United States will not belong at the table.

Let us follow this pledge of our President by doing all we can to strengthen his hand and those of our representatives abroad to condemn such actions and see that these criminals are brought to justice. The most obvious first step that we in the Senate can take—that will reaffirm our commitment to the right of all peoples to live free of fear destruction—is ratification of the Genocide Convention.

The Genocide Convention seeks to punish those who persecute and deny the right to live to a national, ethnic, racial, or religious group. But ratification of this important international treaty will convey an even stronger message: it will show that the United States is determined to back its words and pledges with actions.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in strengthening our hand in protesting the numerous acts of persecution that continue to plague our world by ratifying the Genocide Convention this year.

I yield such time as I may have to the Senator from Missouri.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR EAGLETON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

HARRY S. TRUMAN—THE ROAD TO GREATNESS

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, May 8, 1984, marks the centennial of the birth of one of America's truly great Presidents, Harry S. Truman.

All this year, celebrations will take place throughout Missouri and the Nation. There will be a traveling exhibit sponsored by the Smithsonian Institution, scholarly symposiums and lectures, parades, a joint session of Congress, and many other events.

By all accounts, preparations are being carried out with great enthusiasm and public interest and participation are at a high level.

It is fitting that the life and times of an American President should be recalled in his centennial year. But, I have found that the life of Harry Truman, the values and character and essence of the man, continue to capture the imagination of the American people in a most extraordinary way.

On the personal side, I have two vivid recollections about President Truman.

In 1956, I was elected circuit attorney of St. Louis, my first public office. A few days after the election, a marvelous letter arrived from the former President complimenting me on my election and paying a nice compliment, as well, to my father. My ego, already inflated by winning the election, zoomed off the Richter scale. Here was an inexperienced, obscure youngster named Eagleton getting a personal letter from a former President of the United States. I was thrilled and always will be.

A year later, there was a big Jackson Day Democratic Dinner in Springfield, Ill. President Truman was the featured speaker. He took the train from Kansas City to St. Louis to Springfield. A group of St. Louis politicians, including myself, joined him at the St. Louis stop. I remember walking into the rear lounge car where President Truman was seated.

President Truman said:

You are young Eagleton. Come over here and sit next to me. I want to give you some good political advice.

I nervously sat down.

President Truman spoke:

Tom, being a prosecutor is a tough job. People will ask you to do things you know you shouldn't do. If you ever start accommodating these requests for favors, you will never know where to stop. Say "no" to the first request. Say "no" to the second and the third. Pretty soon the word will get around that you can't be deterred from doing your sworn duty. From then on, people won't bother to ask you. Life will be a lot easier for you and you will be a good public official.

Next, be a loyal national Democrat. I get sick and tired of people who say they are "Dixie" Democrats or "Byrd" Democrats or some other modified form of Democrat. There is only one kind of Democrat, a national Democrat. The national Democratic Party is a broad umbrella and includes everyone. The Republicans are an exclusive bunch; we are inclusive. Never forget your party's heritage. Andrew Jackson—and I've read a lot about him in my time—was one of the great men of our nation. He was for the little guy and wasn't afraid of the rich and powerful. Franklin Roosevelt will go down in history as one of the all-time greats. He took the country out of despair and gave it hope. Read the biographies of Jackson and Roosevelt. Read all you can about Thomas Jefferson. Read about Lincoln. History isn't dead; history is reality. You learn from history; you learn not to make the same mistake twice.

The train bounced on toward Springfield. I absent-mindedly reached for a cigarette.

President Truman said:

You ought to be smart enough to know those damned things aren't good for you. Well, Tom, I've got to talk to some of these old-time politicians in your group. You know some of these men, like Jimmy McAteer and Jack Dwyer, have helped me greatly in my career. I like them. I think politics is a noble profession and people like McAteer and Dwyer are noble men. They are close to the people. They see the needs of the people as they really are, not as some researcher theorizes they are. If politics ever gets away from the people, our country will be in big trouble. That's what I am going to tell the audience in Springfield tonight. Politics is people. People count. People matter. The Democratic Party cares about people. That's why I am a Democrat and always will be to the day I die.

That night, President Truman wowed the audience in Springfield. He talked about people and the people there knew he cared.

The American people strongly identify with Harry Truman because of this caring quality which stemmed from the fact that he was truly one of them. There was never any doubt that Harry Truman empathized with the farmer, the working man, the small businessman, and the citizen of small-town America because he had been all of those things well into his adult life.

From the earliest days of his life, he was educating himself and gaining a wide range of experience that would serve him well in the most important job in the world.

He was the first President since Ulysses S. Grant to have worked a farm with his own hands as an adult. He was a railroad construction timekeeper and bank clerk, among other jobs.

Of all his personal qualities, the one that probably served him best in the White House was his empathy for the common man—what he experienced, what he felt, what he aspired to.

Harry Truman understood the common man because he was the common man, in the finest meaning of the term. He embodied the very idea of government of, by, and for the people.

Like Abraham Lincoln, Harry Truman was not a college graduate. Like Lincoln, he undertook a vigorous course of study at home while still a boy, under the tutelage of a strong mother.

Martha Ellen Truman bought her son many books, particularly in the fields of history and biography. It was the beginning of a lifetime passion for the lessons of the past.

When Gov. Orville Freeman of Minnesota wrote former President Truman in 1958 for "a couple of biographies or historical novels or histories * * * which you felt pointed up particularly the decisionmaking process," he got back a reading list that could occupy many years.

Mr. Truman cited biographies of Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Plutarch's Lives of the great Romans, and numerous memoirs.

He believed that biography was the key to a thorough knowledge of history. A few years earlier he wrote:

Real history consists of the life and actions of great men who occupied the stage at the time.

How true that observation rings when we recall the circumstances under which Vice President Harry S. Truman was thrust onto center stage.

As his biographer, Robert J. Donovan points out, there was great apprehension on the part of the people at home and by fighting men overseas at the death of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. For many millions of servicemen and their countrymen at home, Franklin Roosevelt was the only President they had ever known. Despite Harry Truman's distinguished work as chairman of the Special Committee to Investigate the National Defense program, he had only been Vice President a few months. He was still something of an unknown quantity, not only to much of the public, but to many members of the Washington establishment and our allies as well.

President Truman had good reason to be apprehensive. The greatest war in history was still raging, both in Europe and the Pacific. The industrial and economic base of Europe would have to be rebuilt, the Japanese were yet to be beaten, and the new President would have to learn the complexities of dealing with the Soviet Union—a tall order for any man to face.

Characteristically, he was humble about what lay before him. On his first day in Office, he told a group of reporters:

Boys, if ever you pray, pray for me now. I don't know whether you fellows ever had a load of hay fall on you, but when they told me yesterday what had happened, I felt like the moon, the stars, and all the planets had fallen on me. I've got the most terribly responsible job a man ever had.

But, assuming responsibility and demonstrating leadership were not new to Harry Truman. He had served an apprenticeship in the military and in Government that prepared him well for the Presidency.

With the outbreak of World War I, he helped organize the 2d Regiment of the Missouri Field Artillery, which was placed in Federal service as the 129th Field Artillery. He rose to the rank of captain and took command of battery D.

In later years, his men gave him high marks for leadership.

Said one, "Captain Truman was no arm-chair soldier at any stage of his military career. He went up and down muddy France with his artillerymen from the Vosges Mountains to St. Mihiel; to the Meuse-Argonne offensive; to Verdun."

Another recalled, "Truman slept in the same mud and ate out of the same pots and pans that we did. When his men started on leave, Truman would call on them individually and ask them how they were fixed financially.

If they were short, Truman would lend them 250 frances personally."

And a third said, "Once in the Vosges Mountains in Alsace, Battery D was ordered to fire * * *. The Germans opened up and shells began cracking all around. Truman stood in the open giving commands. He didn't know the meaning of the word fear."

These qualities of courageousness, grace under pressure, and willingness to lead by example would, in later years, well serve Harry Truman and the world.

His innate belief in himself inspired other people. His natural gift for leadership showed the world that Harry Truman was the right man to lead the United States through perhaps the most difficult and dangerous period in its history.

The path that led to the White House began in 1922, when Mr. Truman was elected as a judge on the Jackson County court as a Democrat. The post was an administrative one, requiring supervision of the maintenance and construction of roads and other public facilities.

In this position, as in his Army command, he showed a willingness to do what he asked his subordinates to do. When unpaved roads became muddy following a rainfall, Judge Truman personally graded them, driving a team of Missouri mules.

In 1954, the former President looked back on his years in county government. As in all his endeavors in public life, he was able to conclude that he gave the job all he had and had done some good:

> In 1926 was elected Presiding Judge of Jackson County's Court and took over the running of the administrative end of the County Government. I became thoroughly informed on every phase of County administration, suggested reforms on procedures which were not adopted, became acquainted with the Missouri Legislature and all the County Judges in the State. I caused the whole road system of the county to be rebuilt, rebuilt its public buildings and put it on a sound financial basis. I organized a regional planning system for the metropolitan area which included three counties in Kansas and three in Missouri.

Harry Truman was to know adversity in subsequent years. His two successful races for the U.S. Senate were extremely tough. In 1940, he lacked even the money to buy stamps to seek support for his reelection effort. And 1940 was a year of personal disappointment as well. Despite being reelected to the Senate, Harry Truman could not prevent his 88-year-old mother's farm from being sold out from under her.

The 1940 campaign also showed the people of Missouri the courageous man of principle he was. Senator Truman addressed a gathering of farmers in Sedalia, many of whom had been members of the Ku Klux Klan, by delivering a speech on his commitment to civil rights.

He said:

> I believe in the brotherhood of man, not merely the brotherhood of white men but the brotherhood of all men before law. . . . If any class or race can be permanently set apart from, or pushed down below the rest in political and civil rights, so may any other class or race when it shall incur the displeasure of its more powerful associates, and we may say farewell to the principles on which we count our safety.

Harry Truman did not have to make that speech at that time to that audience, but he did it because he had the courage to confront, not put aside, a controversial issue.

In subsequent speeches, Mr. President, I will discuss the achievements of Senator Truman's second term, specifically his scrutiny of the Nation's war effort, the events that led to his selection as FDR's running mate, and the Truman Presidency.

I am making these speeches because the essence of Harry Truman for us today is his timeliness. Today, in the age of the Imperial Presidency, we could use a healthy dose of Truman candor. In an age when candidates are packaged like soap and sold to the voters, when every major candidate for offices hires a media consultant, we can learn much from Harry Truman.

Once, when filming a television series on his Presidency during his retirement in Independence, Mr. Truman bristled at a filmmaker's suggestion that part of the episode needed dramatization.

He said:

> Now look here, young man, you asked me to tell you the facts, and I'll do it, but I'm not going to be any playactor.

Although he left Office more than 30 years ago, Harry Truman left behind a timeless message for democratic governments: that a nation's leaders must have the courage and honesty to tell the people the unvarnished truth.

Harry Truman's greatness lies in large measure in the strong faith in the American people that his belief reveals. As we celebrate Harry Truman's centennial, let us keep in mind his ideal of courage, honesty, and plain speech. They will continue to strengthen us in the years ahead.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BENTSEN

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRIBLE). Under the previous order, the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

DEFICIT REDUCTION

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, we spent hour upon hour before the recess debating and evaluating proposals to close the deficit gap with higher taxes. And we are in the midst of still even more debate now on the leadership amendment to shrink the deficit gap. Our sense of urgency is surprising to many outside observers, especially those on Wall Street. But they had better begin to pay attention. Election year or not, there is not one Senator who doubts the need to reduce our deficits quickly or who doubts that we will enact a major deficit deduction package, including tax and spending provisions before summer.

THE IMPACT OF INACTION

Any number of studies have forecast the future deficit trend if we take no steps to shrink them. They all agree that rising debt service costs will continue to increase the deficit year after year even under the most optimistic economic outlook and assumptions. On a current service basis, for example, the deficit will be $326 billion in 1989 according to the CBO—or $339 billion if all off-budget items are included. And a recent analysis by the Joint Economic Committee projected one nearly as large, reaching $306 billion in calendar year 1989.

Those deficits have economists and financial experts scared to death. They have the Treasury scared. They have Wall Street scared. They have the Council of Economic Advisers scared. And, they have the President concerned, too—so concerned that he junked his own budget only 1 month after submitting it, to propose a 50-percent larger deficit reduction package. What has everyone scared is the fear that runaway deficits will shortly plunge this Nation once again into the low savings, low growth, low investment, low productivity spiral which gripped it so tightly in the 1970's.

That risk is a real one according to a recent JEC study of the impact of the deficit. For example, it found that if we do nothing to reduce the deficit:

Treasury crowding-out of financial markets will continue to push interest rates up this year and in 1985, as well.

The present investment and inventory boom will cease. As a result, cutting real GNP growth next year by one-half.

Housing starts will fall to 1.5 million units through 1989, supplying enough new housing for only 8 of every 10 new families.

Rising interest rates will keep the dollar overpriced on foreign exchange markets—boosting imports to the United States and costing us 3 million jobs in export and basic U.S. industries.

Investment in new plant and equipment will sag under the twin pressures of rising interest rates and slowing growth, to 10 percent less than during the 1970's.

That will cripple productivity growth and hold it to only 1.8 percent a year—only one-fourth the Japanese rate.

IMPACT OF THE JANUARY BUDGET

That outlook, should we do nothing to shrink the deficit, is scary indeed. Yet, the outlook under the administration January budget proposal is not much different. Alan Greenspan, for example, was quoted in the Wall Street Journal on April 11 saying that the administration's tax and spending balance is so far out of kilter that it raises new threats of soaring inflation and interest rates, and sluggish growth.

The blue chip economic indicators asked 41 prominent economists in March for their projections through next year. The typical projection showed the economy worsening by 1986. For example, the average projected growth rate in 1986 was a scant 1.7 percent, only one-fifth the rate in the first quarter. And they predict that unemployment in 1986 would be rising once again, while housing starts would be falling.

For 1985, the UCLA business forecast is projecting a sharp decline in the growth rate to only 3.2 percent. Merrill Lynch, Data Resource, Evan Econometrics, and Chase Econometrics all are coming in with even lower growth projections—all below 3 percent—for next year.

IMPACT OF THE MARCH BUDGET REVISION

These grim projections are based on the administration budget proposed in January. That budget contained a $100 billion reduction in the deficit. But many felt it did not go far enough. Some Republicans and all Democrats joined in calling for a more aggressive deficit package from the administration. The administration consequently went back to the drawing board, threw out its old budget and—jointly with some congressional Republicans—introduced a larger, $150 billion deficit reduction package on March 15.

Yet, there are at least two analysis showing that the revised March 15 administration proposal will not greatly improve the deficit picture.

New studies by the Joint Economic Committee and Lehman Bros. have found that the March 15 proposal is too little—and it may be too late, as well.

CROWDING-OUT

Crowding-out is already underway by the Treasury's deficit financing operations because interest rates have risen about 1 percentage point since February and 2 percentage points since last year.

Investment in long delayed new plant and equipment is still rising rapidly. It will be up 12.2 percent in real terms this year according to the most recent Commerce Department survey. Yet, the demand for funds to finance that investment is clashing head-on with Treasury financing of the deficit. The result has been an increase in the bank C-D rate, in the overnight Federal funds rate, in mortgage rates, and the 91-day, T-bill rate of over 1 percentage point since February. The prime rate has been increased twice in the last month by 1 percentage point, as well.

Needed long-term corporate investments that yield 12 percent would have been made in February. But they have been crowded out now, put back on the shelf as the corporate bond rate has moved close to 13 percent today.

RISING INFLATION

Adding fuel to this crowding-out is the rising pace of inflation. We have a tendency in this country to learn from only the immediate past and ignore economic problems until they become crises. We have pretty much forgotten the trauma caused by inflation in the late 1970's. But signs are beginning to sprout in abundance like spring flowers that it is coming back. The CPI rose in the third quarter of 1983 at a 3.6-percent pace. And despite falling food prices, which held the CPI down in March, consumer prices still rose in the first quarter of this year at a 5-percent rate.

The leading indicator of inflation compiled by the Center of International Business Cycle Research has jumped 14 percent since 1983. The prices of freely traded primary products like tallow and glass are rising at a 20-percent pace. And a number of industries like paper, plastics, and electrical machinery are operating far above the 85-percent capacity level where price increases typically kick in.

Investors see this surge of inflation beginning. They are doing the only thing they can to protect themselves in light of the deficit by raising interest rates to keep the real interest rate spread up around 5 percent. And they will continue boosting their asking price and interest rates as inflation continues to pick up in the months ahead. The robust 8.3-percent jump in GNP during the first quarter was bad news for inflation and interest rate watchers—and perhaps for the recovery itself.

So, its too late to head off rising interest rates by reducing the deficit. That train has left the station and it means slower growth ahead—something we are already seeing in the interest-sensitive housing market. During March, housing starts collapsed by 27 percent to 1.6 million units—far below the 1.9 million unit average scored in other recoveries. And civilian durable goods orders actually fell in March.

TOO LITTLE TO SHRINK THE DEFICIT

Compounding the fact that the Government is acting too late to reduce deficits is the fear that we may do too little. Various estimates show the deficits rising steadily and totaling about $700 billion over the next 3 years. CBO estimates $695 billion. The JEC estimates $707 billion. And, Lehman Bros. estimates they will total $693 billion.

The $144 billion deficit reduction package proposed by the Republican leadership to deal with these deficits is virtually the administration's March 15 proposal, and it will not reverse the projected rising deficit trend. Lehman Bros., the CBO and JEC econometric projections show that the deficit reduction package is too weak to actually move us toward lower deficit. In 1987, for example, Lehman Bros. project $198 billion in deficits, while the JEC projects $187 billion even if we have continue robust growth, low inflation, falling interest rates and avoid a recession. They will be higher if we do not.

These estimates vary slightly according to the defense baseline spending level utilized and result in different estimates for economic growth, interest rates, inflation and other economic variables. Even so, they tell the same story. The leadership amendment deficit-reduction package will not do the job. It does not have the muscle to avoid crowding out and higher interest rates. In fact, according to Lehman Bros. and the JEC analysis, the package will give us the worst of many economic worlds including:

Lower economic growth; higher interest rates; higher unemployment; and lower savings.

Let me review these findings in brief detail:

The JEC found that the administration and leadership package will not head off higher interest rates this year and will have little impact on them thereafter. Indeed, interest rates on long-term corporate bonds are projected to increase in 1987. And, overall, interest rates through 1988 will not be much different with or without the leadership deficit reduction plan.

Compared to the GNP outlook if we do nothing at all of the deficit, Lehman Bros. found that the administration plan will cut GNP growth by up to 1 percent in 1985, 1986, and 1987. In effect, Lehman Bros. says this plan does two things. The lower spending and higher taxes in it hurt growth, and that lower growth is not offset by lower interest rates. Since interest rates fall very little by 1987 because of the plan's small impact, the net effect is to cut GNP growth by nearly $190 billion or $350 for every man, woman, and child over the next 3 years—compared to the outlook if Congress simply sits on its hands and does nothing to reduce the deficit.

That is quite a price to pay for no reduction in the deficit trend.

Compared to unemployment if no action occurs on the deficit, Lehman Bros. projects that the plan before us will add three-tenths of 1 percent to unemployment in 1985, seven-tenths of 1 percent in 1986 and 1 percent in 1987. In other words—because it slows economic growth—the leadership amendment will halt progress against unemployment and leave over 1 million more men and women out of work by 1987 than would be if we do nothing to shrink the deficit.

That is quite a price to pay for no reduction in the deficit.

Moreover, the JEC found that the plan before us will cut the savings rate even further than it fell in the 1970's. Individuals saved 7.1 percent on average of their disposable income from 1971 to 1980. Under the leadership plan, that rate will fall to only 5.3 percent through 1989, even lower than the 5.4-percent rate expected if we do nothing at all on the deficit.

That reduction in savings will cripple productivity growth, as well. The JEC found that it will shrink to average 1.8 percent through 1989 under the twin forces of slower growth and weak savings. Since 1950, U.S. productivity has grown an average 2.3 percent annually. The lower rate will cut real GNP by compounding one-half of 1 percent a year. By 1988, the lower productivity will have cut GNP a total of 5 percent or $200 billion. That represents lost income to every man, woman, and child of over $800.

That is quite a price to pay for no reduction in the deficit.

An even greater price will be paid if the reaction to the March 15 administration proposal by the housing industry comes true. Just 2 weeks ago, Michael Sumichrast of the National Association of Home Builders jumped his mortgage rate projections by nearly 50 percent. He is now predicting a return to rates above 15 percent within a year. Moreover, he went further on April 11 and predicted a decline in housing starts to only 1.5 million units next year, down nearly 20 percent from his 1984 projection.

These forecasts coincide with the reaction of Henry Kaufman. In a speech recently before the Economic Club of Detroit, he predicted a jump in the prime rate to 15.25 percent by next year from 12 percent now and 11 percent in mid-March. Moreover, he predicted that long-term Government bonds would reach above 15 percent next year, due to crowding out—matching their high point during the last recession.

A LARGER PACKAGE NEEDED

These grim projections and interest rate estimates all point in the same direction. If we enact the leadership deficit package, we will be doing too little, too late. The economy will slow down but the deficits will not.

Lehman Bros. urges a larger deficit reduction package. The CBO and JEC analyses argue for one. And I strongly argue for one.

The JEC analysis contained a comparison of the administration's deficit reduction package and a $50 billion larger one, of the magnitude to be proposed shortly by Senator CHILES. The differences were striking. The larger package was found to clear out financial markets more effectively and resulted in real interest rates which were over 1 percentage point lower in 1987 and nearly 2 percentage points lower in 1988 than with the leadership plan. Nominal interest rates were 2 percent lower by then, as well.

These lower rates were found to have a dramatic impact on growth, productivity, and the deficit. Over each of the next 5 years, for example, real GNP was found to grow nearly 1 percentage point faster than with the administration's proposal. Productivity growth rose above 2 percent annually—the Federal deficit was reduced to $122 billion by 1988, and shrank even further to $82 billion by 1989.

CONCLUSION

In crafting economic policy, the President, the Federal Reserve, and Congress all deal with a great deal of uncertainty over the economic outlook. We have the devil of a time getting the same story from even two economists. Yet, the current debate over sizing our deficit reduction package is remarkable in that regard because we are hearing the same thing from most of them. They are telling us that the deficit reduction package narrowly reported by the Budget Committee and before us now does not have the muscle needed to reverse the deficit trend. It will not do the job. The job is a big one, and only a bigger deficit reduction package will work.

Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to exceed beyond the hour of 11:30 a.m. with statements therein limited to 2 minutes each.

DON'T FORGET TAIWAN

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, today President Reagan is arriving in Peking on a trip intended to improve relations with Red China and to enhance the prospects of free trade and world peace. I wish the President well and I hope it is a successful trip, but I also wish that the President would make a dramatic gesture of friendship toward the people of Taiwan as he returns to Washington.

It is vitally important that both the Red Chinese and the Free Chinese understand that the United States will not turn its back on its long-time trusted allies at the same time it gains new friends. The President has often said himself that "we must not forget old friends as we make new ones."

Clearly there are advantages to be gained by improving relations with the world's most populous nation. But they must not be won at the expense of faithful friends and allies. In previous efforts to curry favor with the Communists on the mainland of China, the United States has made most of the concessions and compromises, steadily weakening our support for Taiwan's efforts to remain free and independent of Peking's rule.

This time, if there are any concessions or compromises, they should come from Red China. The President can—and I trust he will—negotiate from a position of strength, because it is clear that the Red Chinese need us more than we need them. Before any deals are cut, the President should declare that the United States is not going to give away the store, that commercial, cultural and diplomatic or strategic relations must be a two-way street. His bargaining position will be strengthened if, from the outset, he makes it clear that the United States will not betray its friends on Taiwan and that they can count on us to help them maintain their prosperity and their freedom.

Red China's antagonism toward the Soviet Union ties down some of Moscow's military forces which might otherwise be deployed against the West. But we should have no illusions that Peking would risk war with the Russians to please the United States. In fact, the Red Chinese have been holding reconciliation talks with the Russians and they will host a very high-ranking Soviet visitor right after President Reagan leaves.

Communism, however, is an economic failure. Red China is a pitifully poor country, and it cannot get what it needs from the Soviet Union to modernize its economy or raise its standard of living. Obviously we can help the Red Chinese, but they can help themselves far more if they are willing to gradually move away from the failure of communism and toward the success of capitalism, which is responsible for the economic miracle that has taken place in Taiwan and Singapore and other Asian nations.

That is the message I hope President Reagan will bring to the people of Red China and their leaders this week—the message that "Free Economies Make the Difference," the title of an excellent article by Edward Neilan in yesterday's Washington Times. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Neilan's article be printed in the RECORD, and urge my colleagues to read it.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FREE ECONOMIES MAKE DIFFERENCE

TAIPEI, REPUBLIC OF CHINA.—They are known somewhat facetiously as the "gang of four" or the "four tiger cubs" or the "booming babies."

The nicknames refer to Asia's friskiest and fastest growing economies, those of South Korea, Singapore, Hong Kong and the Republic of China.

In addition to being blatant examples of capitalism at its best production, the strength of the four nations' economies comprises severe embarrassment to the People's Republic of China.

Among the four, the one whose success most rankles, most strongly yanks the tail and tweaks the whiskers of the Big Tiger (China) is the Republic of China here on Taiwan.

President Reagan and his entourage will see with their own eyes in Peking, Shanghai and Xian this week that the People's Republic of China, for all of its bombast, is pitifully far behind Nationalist China in terms of development.

Three of the four "tiger cubs"—Taiwan, Hong Kong and Singapore—are basically Chinese societies.

Why is it that Chinese in those places prosper and break production and manufacturing and sales records but the Chinese on the mainland don't?

The difference is elementary, dear Watson. It is the difference between the opportunity and motivation and incentives and freedom of capitalism and the restraints, control and drabness of the communist system.

Name one communist nation whose economy works, let alone prospers.

It is no accident that currently there are negotiations or political campaigns under way instigated by Peking to take control of Hong Kong, Nationalist China (Taiwan) and (through North Korea) South Korea. By absorbing these places into the gray drabness of their own communist systems, the embarrassing economic comparisons will cease.

One statistic jabs even the most disinterested layman right in the eye.

That is the amount of trade the United States does with mainland or communist China (where Mr. Reagan is visiting this week) on one hand, and Nationalist China on Taiwan (which was once recognized diplomatically by the United States and embraced as a special friend by Mr. Reagan) on the other.

Mainland China has one billion people in 3,691,521 square miles, and the two-way trade between that country and the United States amounted to $4.4 billion last year.

Nationalist China, with 18 million people and just over 13,000 square miles, contributed to two-way trade with the United States last year of $15.5 billion.

Peking's insistence on taking over sovereignty of Hong Kong in 1997 and stating that the colony's prosperity and lifestyle will not be affected under communism is possibly the most ridiculous line of reasoning in current world affairs.

Most of Hong Kong's more than 5 million Chinese inhabitants—those basically responsible for Hong Kong's economic miracle—left communist China at great risk. They left seeking freedom and opportunity. Why would they want to be a part of something that reverts back to the crude and boring life under communism?

In Shanghai last year, a college student mentioned to me that he knew "the people of Taiwan want to join us as soon as possible." The young man was earnest and believed what he was saying because it was based on the only information available, China's controlled press.

He didn't know about the economic success and personal freedom that exists here in Taipei and other cities of the Republic of China. If he knew and if he had a choice, he would "join Taiwan" rather than the other way around.

Last year there were roughly 10,000 students from the People's Republic of China studying in the United States. Just over 1,000—or more than 10 percent—asked for political asylum or defected outright after getting a glimpse and feel of the freedom of American life. Tennis player Hu Na was the most celebrated case, but there were literally hundreds of others.

When was the last time anyone heard of someone defecting to a communist country?

This positive image and spirit of American freedom is the main commodity Mr. Reagan will be displaying in China during his visit.

A lot has been written about China's revolution. But the longest running success story is our revolution back in the United States. That's the one that the four "tiger cubs" are using as a model and the one we ought to encourage ever more forcefully.

JUNTA PATRIOTICA CUBANA STATEMENT TO THE ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES AND TO PRESIDENT REAGAN

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement presented to the Organization of American States on November 14, 1983, by the Junta Patriotica Cubana. I also ask unanimous consent that a junta letter to the President dated March 19, 1984, be printed in the RECORD. I strongly commend the Junta Patriotica Cubana, and in particular its Washington representative, the distinguished Dr. Claudio Benedi, for their excellent efforts to promote the Monroe Doctrine and a firm American foreign policy in Central America.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUNTA PATRIOTICA CUBANA,
Washington, D.C., November 14, 1983.

Hon. Chairman of the 13th. Period of Sessions, General Assembly of the O.A.S.

Hon. Ambassadors and Representatives of the American Republics,

DISTINGUISHED REPRESENTATIVES OF THE AMERICAS: We have the pleasure and the historical duty of addressing you and, through you intercession, the peoples and governments of the Americas, in order to reiterate, as participants in the Inter-American System and in our condition of persons born in the Cuban State, the position of the Cuban people and their rights in the conjunction of the American nations. Furthermore, we do this in our capacity as representatives of the organizations that comprise the Cuban Patriotic Board, and in their behalf.

The Cuban State, from which we originate, is a part of the Inter-American System, and a member of the Organization of American States (OAS). What is excluded from the System is the current Marxist-Leninist government, because if its being incompatible with the Inter-American System.

The Cuban State has signed with the American States that you represent, treaties, covenants, agreements and resolutions which are in force in the Inter-American System. Your nations and the Free Cuban State "have entered into agreements freely, but have not become obligated by the agreements" ("pacta sunt servanda"), as stated by the father of International Law, the Rev. F. Francisco Vitoria.

The Cuban State is one and indivisible, and its rights must of necessity be protected by the other Member States in the O.A.S., as regulated by treaties and covenants in force. Cuba is a part of the Americas and it is united to their destiny.

The Seventh Consultation Meeting of Foreign Affairs Ministers of the Americas, convened in accordance with the Treaty of Rio at San José, Costa Rica, declared:

"1. The intervention or threat of intervention, including those subject to conditions, from an extra-continental power, in the domestic affairs of any American Republic, is hereby condemned, and we underline that acceptance of the threat of intervention from an extra-continental power by any American State imperils the solidarity and security of the Americas, thus compelling the Organization of American States to condemn and reject it also with a similar vigor."

Nobody doubts that Castro's satellite government has "accepted the threat of intervention from an extra-continental power" (the Soviet Union) and that he has "imperiled the solidarity and security of the Americas." The "acceptance", the "threat" and the "intervention of an extra-continental power" (the Soviet Union) are much larger, more militant and more serious nowadays than they were when said declaration was approved. This has been proven in Grenanda and Nicaragua, and also regarding the Salvadoran guerrillas, besides many other instances, should any further proof be still needed.

All of this, which is already in place in Cuba, is also happening at a fast pace in Nicaragua, that is proceeding rapidly towards a Marxist-Leninist totalitarian regime, subordinate to Castro and the Soviet Union. Both countries (Cuba and Nicaragua) serve as bases for ideological, political, economic and military subversion, as well as for terrorism and destabilization of other American States, such as El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Costa Rica, Colombia and Peru, among them.

The Eighth Consultation Meeting of Foreign Affairs Ministers of the Americas, convened in Uruguay in accordance with the Treaty of Rio, passed Resolution VI, which declares that "Marxist-Leninist Doctrine is incompatible with the Inter-American system." That declaration of incompatibility has not been revoked, it is in force. If we are to be respected in the world, we must enforce our treaties and resolutions.

The Ninth Consultation Meeting of Foreign Affairs Ministers, convened in accordance with the Treaty of Rio, and assembled at the O.A.S. headquarters in Washington, D.C., in 1964, declared:

"1. That the present government of Cuba, since its inception in 1959, has developed, supported and conducted, in several ways, a policy of intervention in the American Continent, with methods, propaganda, provision of funds, training in sabotage and guerrilla operations, provision of armaments and assistance to those movements that promote the subversion of national institutions, through the use of force, with the aim of installing communist regimes . . ."

"2. That assistance to subversion generally adopts the shape of political aggression . . ."

The Ninth Consultation Meeting resolved:

"a. To condemn the present government of Cuba as an aggressor, and because of its intervention in the domestic affairs of other States, thus violating their territories and sovereignties."

That condemnation against the present government of Cuba is still in force, and its strict enforcement is now more necessary and urgent than ever, because the satellite government of Cuba is a danger and a threat to the rest of the American States, and has ridiculed those agreements and resolutions that have been adopted, as well as it has continued to intervene in the domestic affairs of other States, thus violating their sovereignties. It shall continue to do so, due to the expansive nature of communism.

The Soviet Union has shipped to Cuba over 64,000 tons of weapons, that have been utilized not only to equip one million Cuban militiamen but also have been exported to Nicaragua, Grenada, the Salvadoran, Guatemalan, Honduran & Colombian guerrillas, and to other countries in the Americas and Africa.

A supply and repair base for Soviet nuclear submarines has been built at Cienfuegos Bay, in Cuba, and Soviet submarines have already been repaired there, such as that which sustained damages recently near the United States shores and was towed by Cuban ships to Cienfuegos. Is there any further proof needed?

The communist government of Cuba presently has an extensive array of MIG-23 & MIG-27 warplanes, that are capable of transporting nuclear warheads. The MIG-27's have a wider range and are much more dangerous, in their capacity of "offensive nuclear weapons", than those which were stationed in Cuba in 1962 (IL-28's), and which brought about the nuclear missile crisis. Besides, there are in Cuba over 12 "BEAR TU-95 D and F" Soviet bombers. These are anti-submarine warplanes, capable of attacking targets on land and at sea. The Soviets have stationed these planes on a permanent basis in Cuba now. They have also built in Cuba nine airfields specially equipped for bombers.

It has been proven that nuclear submarines of the "Golf" and "Echo" classes have also visited Cuba in several instances.

Cuba is the only country in Latin-America that has not signed the Treaty of Tlatelolco against the proliferation of nuclear weapons in the Americas. The reasons are obvious.

It has also been verified that the Soviet Union has a combat brigade stationed in Cuba, besides numerous high-ranking military personnel, some of them disguised as "technicians", "businesspersons" or "diplomats."

Several Soviet warships equipped with nuclear missiles have visited Cuba in 1980, 1981 and 1982. These Soviet naval squadrons have cruised the Caribbean and are a great direct threat against the oil fields & refineries in Venezuela and Mexico.

In summation, the Soviets have now in Cuba 40 MIG combat warplanes, and 12 BEAR bombers, with a total of 52 strategic warfare planes with a capability to transport atomic weapons, in operation and location there. These constitute a threat and danger several times greater than there were in 1962. Senator James A. McClure has inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD these and other proofs of Soviet presence in Cuba, and Senator STEVE SYMMS has done likewise. Both of them have denounced it before the full United States Senate. Other sources have corroborated the statements issued by the above listed Senators.

Despite the fact that the Soviet Union is a signatory to the Second Protocol of the Treaty of Tlatelolco, obliging itself not to introduce nuclear weapons into the Americas, it has violated said Treaty, as is easily verifiable.

There are recent reports that link the Soviet Union and Cuba with activities related to chemical and biological weapons in Cuba, which infringes the Treaty on Biological Weapons of 1975 and the Geneva Convention on Chemical Weapons of 1925. These informations, that have been documented by several sources, by the U.S. Department of State, by diplomatic personnel stationed in Cuba and finally by clandestine sources, are proof of violations committed by the current government of Cuba, and of the danger that they pose for all of the Americas.

The KGB (Soviet secret political police) has taken over all intelligence and espionage services in Cuba, through its strict control of the D.G.I. (Dirección General de Inteligencia).

There are 37 "schools" in Cuba for training and preparation of guerrilleros, saboteurs and terrorists from all nations in the Americas, run by Soviet, Czech, East-German & Cuban personnel.

The communist government of Cuba utilizes its naval facilities and long shores for narcotics smuggling, and avails itself of the ships that perform that illegal traffic to introduce clandestine weapons intended for Central-American, Caribbean and Colombian guerrillas, as well as for other subversive movements in this hemisphere, as it has been proven.

The Soviet Union's objective, through its satellites in Cuba and Nicaragua, is taking over all of the American nations. This objective cannot be negotiated or settled. They might be able to compromise to "peace" in Central-America for tactical reasons, in the same manner that Hitler compromised in Munich, and there will probably be imitators for Chamberlain in the Americas, ready to let themselves be deceived, thus betraying the destinies of their nations and the future of the Americas.

Jose Marti, the Apostle of Cuban Independence, said: "To witness a crime silently is equivalent to commit a crime."

Human rights are universal values, indivisible in their enforcement, maintenance and defense, and it is not possible to discriminate upon denouncing violations committed against them.

Violations against human rights are being committed by the communist government of Cuba in an institutionalized manner, starting with the so-called "1976 Constitution" and following with its laws, daily practices, in all the country and, especially, in the communist dungeons, where a cruel, subhuman and degrading treatment is constantly in force. This has been denounced by several international organizations, the Inter-American Commission for Human Rights among them.

Political imprisonment in Cuba, at the present time, is the longest and most cruel recorded in the Americas, and human rights are violated in those prisons in a totalitarian fashion. Political prisoners called "Plantados" (those who have stood up to the communist government, by not submitting to communist indoctrination), are especially singled out for the most cruel and inhuman treatments.

There are male and female political prisoners in walled up cells (tapiadas), which have no windows at all. Those political prisoners are not allowed to see the sunlight, and are additionally subjected to physical, psychological and psychiatric tortures.

Over 200 Cuban workers were incarcerated and five of them sentenced to the death penalty (afterward commuted to 30 years of forced labor), because of having tried to organize a labor union similar to Solidarity in Poland. Because of our denouncement, a case has been open at the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

Executions by firing squads have continued in Cuba. The largest number of executions recently took place on October 1st, 1982, at the moats of La Cabana Military Fortress, La Habana, where Armando Hernandez Gonzalez, 35; Ramon Toledo, 41 and 27 other political prisoners arrested under the same summary were executed.

Other executions by firing squads have also taken place at the Military Barracks in Mangua; the victims have been youngsters who have refused to combat as "internationalists" in Angola, Nicaragua and other countries. The bodies of those executed are not delivered to their relatives; they are told that "their relatives have been sent abroad" and those who complain become victims of political persecution.

There are thousands of political prisoners all over the island. Some of them are thus classified, but other are labeled "common prisoners" in order to show a lesser amount of political prisoners. In effect, the whole island is a large place of imprisonment.

The Thirteenth Meeting of the General Assembly of the O.A.S. has a legal and moral obligation to learn, during this period of ordinary sessions, about violations against human rights in Cuba and, above all, the institutionalized violation of human rights, despite the fact that the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights may have not included that issue in its annual report, because of an omission that we believe is not justified by explanations regarding the seventh report. On Chapter II of the annual report, references are included regarding the human rights situations in the American countries, and Cuba must have been included. This Thirteenth Meeting of the General Assembly, as well as the Commission on Human Rights, are competent to learn about violations against human rights in Cuba, since the Cuban State is a member of the Inter-American System and of the Organization of American States.

WE STATE TO THIS HONORABLE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, AND REQUEST FROM SAME

1. That we have the right to have the voice of the Cuban state heard. We are the voice of those who have no voice to be heard.

2. The enforcement of all treaties, agreements, covenants and resolutions presently in force within the Inter-American System.

3. That all Cubans, those still in the Island and the one million who are in exile, are only one body and make up the democratic Cuban nation. That we all together, based on the experiences of the past, shall build, starting from the present, our respective futures, not looking backwards, but forward.

4. That we reject any kind of coexistence or "détente" with the Marxist-Leninist satellite regime of Castro.

5. That, while we struggle for the Independence of Cuba, the "cruel, inhuman and degrading" treatment to which male and female political prisoners are subjected in Cuba be denounced before the Americas & the world, in order for the tortures to come to an end, especially regarding the "Plantados", in centers of confinement and forced labor camps.

6. Freedom is a natural and inalienable right for men and women, and also for all peoples. There cannot be freedom in the Americas if there is no freedom in Cuba.

7. We request everybody's cooperation for the enforcement of the Joint Resolution adopted by the United States Congress, known as the Symms Amendment of August, 1982, whereby the United States is committed to fight together with freedom-loving Cubans and with the Organization of American States (OAS) to attain the right of self-determination for the Cuban people. This is equivalent to the liberation of the Cuban people.

8. The Inter-American System and those nations and government that are comprised in it, have the moral and legal duty of helping the Cuban people to rid itself from Soviet neo-colonialism, maintained there by the use of force through a satellite government. We, Cubans in the Island and outside of it, are in the forefront of that fight.

9. That independence and freedom for almost all nations in the Americas were attained through the intervention of patriots and other American nations in the domestic affairs of the liberated countries. Bolivar, San Martin, O'Higgins are examples of that. Chile, Peru, Bolivia and Ecuador, just to mention a few, would not have been able to achieve independence at that time, had not the other countries intervened in their behalf. In the same manner, the United States intervened to attain Mexico's independence—and such an intervention was decisive in the defeat of Maximilian. France, Spain and Cuba intervened, in a determining manner, to help attain independence for the United States of America.

10. That the so-called "Kennedy-Khrushchev Understanding" has been violated by the Soviet Union and by Castro, and is null and void, as it has been declared by the U.S. President, Ronald Reagan, in an interview with Cuban journalist Tomas P. Regalado, last September.

11. That the Treaty of Rio must be applied to the Marxist-Leninist satellite regime of Cuba.

12. That the Punta del Este Resolution be enforced as a whole, whereby it was declared that "Marxist-Leninist doctrine is incompatible with the Inter-American System."

13. That in the same manner as Eastern European countries receive information through Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty, we Cubans have the right to convey the truth to Cuba through Radio Marti, for which we request everybody's cooperation.

14. That this Board be afforded the representation of the Cuban State, since the current government of Cuba is excluded from the Inter-American System and the O.A.S.

15. That condemnation be issued against institutional and de facto violations of human rights in Cuba, in accordance with the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, and the principles and values of Judeo-Christian civilization.

16. That the Organization of American States appoint from its midst a decolonization committee, to free up Cuba and Nicaragua from Soviet colonialism.

That the Soviet Union be forced to withdraw its occupation troops from the territory of an American State (Cuba), and to remove from this hemisphere the weapons that it has introduced in Cuba, Nicaragua, El Salvador and other American countries.

That the Thirteenth Meeting of the O.A.S. General Assembly will enact the establishment of the position of Commissioner for Political Refugees, since this problem already affects millions of persons in the Americas.

17. That the General Assembly will declare that "there is no freedom of expression, of the press, of religion, of assembly, of travel, nor any freedom to organize a labor union in Cuba, and that the human person's liberty, integrity and life is not respected in Cuba.

18. That a declaration be issued by the General Assembly to the effect that Cuba has neither signed nor ratified the Treaty of Tlatelolco on the Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons in the Americas, and that it maintains its territory open to nuclear weapons, airplanes and submarines which carry them, and thus imperils all of the Americas, as it happened in 1962 at the time of the so-called "missile crisis."

19. That the Cuban satellite regime be declared guilty of engaging in the illegal traffic of narcotics in the Americas.

20. That pertinent steps be taken for the release of Cuban political prisoners, in Cuba, Venezuela, Mexico, Coasta Rica and the United States.

21. That the Thirteenth Meeting of the General Assembly will declare that the Castro's satellite regime is one which is aligned with the Soviet Union.

22. That assistance will be given to Cuban Freedom Fighters, both inside and outside of Cuba, in the same manner that such assistance is given to Freedom Fighters in other countries subjugated by the Soviet Imperialism (Nicaragua and Afghanistan).

23. That our condition of belligerents in the struggle for Cuban freedom be established and recognized, although we shall continue to fight, with or without said recognition, in the same manner that we have fought thus far.

24. That assistance will be given us in order to dismantle the military, subversive, ideological and political base installed by the Soviet Union in Cuba, presently utilized for the establishment of neo-colonialism in this hemisphere.

25. That Great Britain be forced to negotiate with the Republic of Argentina and to recognize that the Malvinas Islands are Argentinian.

26. That we salute and support President Ronald W. Reagan's policies in this hemisphere, clearly stated in his historical speech before the Organization of American States on February 24, 1982.

27. That we support the collective action exercised against the Soviet Union's intervention through its satellites in Grenada, Cuba and Nicaragua.

28. We declare that collective action is recognized by the OAS Charter, in the Treaty of OECO, in the Treaty of CONDECA and in the Inter-American Reciprocal Assistance Treaty, also known as the "Treaty of Rio", as the basis for legitimate defense of our hemisphere. It is the counter-intervention opposed to the extra-continental intervention of international communism, represented by the Soviet Union.

29. We declare that, had Collective Action been exercised timely in Cuba, as it was in the Dominican Republic and Grenada, there would be peace and security in the Americas, which there will not be until we, working together, will eliminate the neo-colonialist base established by the Soviet Union in Cuba.

30. We request the circulation of this document among Member Nations present in this Thirteenth Meeting of the General Assembly, since the Cuban State continues to be a member of the Inter-American System and its judicial and political entity, the Organization of American States.

JUNTA PATRIOTICA CUBANA,
Miami, Fla., March 19, 1984.

Hon. RONALD W. REAGAN,
President of the United States, c/o The White House, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Cuban Patriotic Council, the major coalition of Cuban organizations in exile, wishes to express its support to your reelection. We are determined to see that you win a second term that would enable you to finish all the projects that were commenced during your present Administration.

The Cuban Patriotic Council wishes to emphasize that the best reason for your reelection would be to strengthen the defense capability of the United States and those efforts to assure peace and liberty throughout the world and the welfare of this great nation.

We Cubans are willing to help you, Mr. President, because we trust you, and because of your firm position against communism and also because you know the risk the free world would be under if the United States does not assume a firm leadership.

You have recognized, Mr. President, the danger that Cuba, the communist bastion in the Caribbean, represents. You are also aware of the difficult economic and political situation in Latin America. This is worsened by the armed guerrillas financed by the sovietized Cuba;

Therefore, we wish to express that:

1. The only way to get rid of the guerrillas and stop the danger to the United States and Latin America would be to eliminate the regime that oppresses Cuba. Accordingly, we, Mr. President, reiterate that Senator Symms' Amendment of August 11, 1982, which reaffirm the resolution of the Congress of October 1962, should be enforced;

"(a) To prevent by whatever means may be necessary, including the use of arms, the Marxist-Lenninist regime in Cuba from extending by force of the threat of force in aggressive or subversive activities to any part of this Hemisphere;

"(b) To prevent in Cuba the creation or use of an externally supported military capability endangering the security of the United States; and

"(c) To work with freedom-loving Cubans to support the aspirations of the Cuban people for self-determination;"

To prevent Cuba from being a sanctuary for the training and sending of terrorists and guerrillas to other countries and the export of Russian military equipment to other nations. We support your policy in Central America and we know that the only solution is through military action not negotiation.

To force all infiltrated Communists to register as agents of foreign governments and to deport those who act as spies in the United States.

To strictly enforce the economic and commercial embargo imposed by the United States against the totalitarian regime in Cuba. We take this opportunity to denounce that this embargo is violated by planes leaving Miami and other cities carrying all kind of merchandise to Cuba. There are over six such agencies in Miami trafficking people, dollars and merchandise, thus helping the economic situation in Cuba. These agencies are unlawful and are serving the Cuban government. We hope this illegal trade will be stopped immediately.

For the welfare of the entire American Continent and Cuba, we urge that the above be given adequate consideration.

Thank you very much, Mr. President, for your assistance.

We remain,

Respectfully,

CUBAN PATRIOTIC COUNCIL,
DR. MANUEL A. DE VARONA,
President.
DR. CLAUDIO F. BENEDI,
Delegate in Washington (National Board).
DESIDERIO PERDOMO,
President of Cuban Municipalities.

CHAMPION OF LIBERTY

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, great men, when they pass away, leave great absences. It will take a great man indeed to fill the shoes of Leonard E. Read, the intellectual guide for all fighters of free enterprise and liberty.

That his death will not make the network news does not detract from the accomplishments of his life. Perhaps Leonard would have wanted it that way.

For most of his career, Leonard swam against the current. Just a few short years ago, it took great courage to defend classical liberal economics against the prevailing Keynesian wisdom: a heresy that often invited scorn.

That Ronald Reagan and many of us in Washington are now trying to steer America back toward the direction of a free market has a lot to do with Leonard, who held the banner high in the wilderness years.

Leonard preferred to stay out of the limelight. He influenced other thinkers in his own low-key—but effective—manner. This was his style. But in his own easy-going, affable way, Leonard was a prime mover of history.

I ask unanimous consent that the following articles, by John Chamberlain in Human Events and Clarence B. Carson in Review of the NEWS, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A "FREEDOM PHILOSOPHER" PASSES FROM THE SCENE

(By John Chamberlain)

A great man died the other day—and got a mere two inches of type in the New York Times, which apparently knew nothing about the importance of his career.

Leonard Read, the man in question, was the creator of the first important conservative foundation to come into being in the aftermath of World War II.

His Foundation for Economic Education, which settled itself in an old building in Irvington-on-Hudson, N.Y., next to Washington Irving's Sunnyside river bank home, came before the American Enterprise Institute, the Heritage Foundation and other conservative think-tanks that helped create the climate that finally turned the 1964 defeat of Barry Goldwater into victory for Ronald Reagan in 1980.

During all the years between the time of Harry Truman's Fair Deal and the present, Read's foundation nurtured a wide variety of "Austrian," or classical liberal, economists who were destined to challenge the campus reign of the Keynesians, who believed in government intervention and lots of it.

The many students who were trained in a famous Ludwig von Mises seminar at New York University found hospitality at the Read Foundation. I first met Milton Friedman, a future Nobel Prizewinner, at Leonard Read's home. That was years before Friedman had become and adviser to governments all over the world.

If it hadn't been for economists and historians that Read had taken under his wing, Ronald Reagan would never have heard of half the ideas that subsequently made him governor of California and President of the United States.

The mystery of it all is that Leonard Read could have attracted big support for his foundation without ever emphasizing his own personality. He did nothing to put himself in the limelight. He never, to my knowledge, grabbed anyone by the lapel. He never plucked a sleeve. He never raised his voice. Once in a while he would say, of a supposed lover of liberty who was inconsistent, that the man "leaked," but that was as personal as Leonard Read ever got.

He must have written more than 20 quiet, well-argued little books during his life. What is interesting about them is that this man who created an economic foundation seldom quoted economists to sustain his own belief in what he termed the "freedom philosophy." A typical Read index would contain references to 30 philosophers, poets, religious teachers and literary men to one economist.

Read didn't like jargon, even when it was on his side. He didn't talk about "liberalism" and "conservatism," or even "libertarianism." It was enough to talk of the freedom philosophy as it could be embraced by anybody who had read James Madison or Thomas Jefferson.

Leonard Read's introduction to his own mature way of thinking was characteristic of his open-mindedness. As head of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce he had gone to see Bill Mullendore of the Southern California Edison Co., intending to tell Mullendore that he was all wrong in opposing some facet of the mixed Roosevelt-Truman economy. But instead of convincing Mullendore, he found himself listening to an entirely different approach to contemporary affairs. In a good half-hour Mullendore had convinced him.

Read's formula for improving the world was to avoid ostentatious proselytizing in favor of practicing self-improvement. He had a theory that people only become convinced by example. His seminars stressed the importance of perfecting one's own philosophy before thinking of raising one's voice in public. At meetings of the Mont Pelerin Society, which he helped Nobel Prizewinner Frederick Hayek to found, he seldom took part in open debate. He preferred conversation in the hallways.

The paradox is that this self-effacing man should have become a most trusted money-raiser and trainer of important public personages. You would see a congressman such as Sen. Steve Symms of Idaho, or Rep. Ron Paul of Texas, at his affairs. His most recent lecturer, Michael Novak, the author of The Spirit of Democratic Capitalism, invited to talk just before Read had died, reminded people that the subject of the compatibility of capitalism with both democracy and religion had been canvassed in Read's own books.

Read felt that there was someone "up there" who pulled strings to help human beings become partners in creation. He took the phrase "in God we trust" seriously.

His economic theory was part of a wider science of choice. A believer in voluntary association as well as in individualism, Read's touchstone for action was "anything that's peaceful." He will be greatly missed by thousands who knew him all over the Western world.

ECONOMICS

(By Clarence B. Carson)

It is written that "Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God." It has been my good fortune for the past 21 years or so to know a man whom I would place in the select category of peacemakers. No, he never won the Nobel Peace Prize. So far as I know, he never negotiated any peace treaties among nations. He never engaged in shuttle diplomacy, never dashed hither and yon over the globe engaging in negotiations, never even negotiated a pact with a labor union. He was after something much more basic than what is involved in hammering out compromises that rarely please anyone. He was a man of principle. He was a teacher. For the past 37 years as president and founder of The Foundation for Economic Education he taught what it pleased him to call the freedom philosophy.

I refer, of course, to the late Leonard E. Read, who passed away on May 14th, at the mature age of 84. Although the stated purpose of his foundation was economic education, Leonard was not primarily, or even secondarily, an economist. My point is not that he wasn't formally trained in economics, though he was not, nor that he did not become thoroughly imbued with the principles of economics, for he certainly did. No man could have been more enamored with the workings of the free market than he, or been more greatly impressed with what can be produced by the division of labor. One of the most delightful pieces he ever wrote, "I, Pencil," was a celebration of the wonders wrought by the voluntary cooperation of many people. No one knows every aspect of how to make a pencil, Leonard said. Yet few objects are more common, more generally available, or more widely used. Few objects of manufacture are less complex, but each actual pencil is the end product of the labor of thousands, from miners to foresters to sawyers to the finishers.

But Leonard Read was not an economist. One way to describe his work is to say that he was an enlightener. He would have liked that way of putting it, I think. One of his favorite demonstrations was with a light in a darkened room. The amount of light emitted could be increased or decreased by turning a knob. At first, there would be only a tiny pinpoint of light in the room. Notice, he would point out, that though the darkness surrounds and almost overwhelms, every eye is drawn to the light. As he increased the amount of light, Leonard would call attention to the fact that as the circle of light expanded it came into contact with more and more of the darkness. It was his way of showing not only how light attracts and overcomes darkness but also how the more we learn—the more we are enlightened—the more we can become aware of how much we do not know.

Above all, Leonard Read was a moral teacher. Even when he talked about economics, which was often, his emphasis was apt to be more upon a fulfilling way of life than upon making money. Only those who are responsible and free, he thought, can be moral beings. Choice is the key. The principles of the market were for him a mirror of the morality that pervades the universe. Those principles are: freedom of choice, voluntary cooperation, willing exchange, and Anything That's Peaceful, as he titled one of his books. He believed in limited government and in individual liberty, the conditions under which man's creative energies are released for constructive activity. Force is anathema, except for defensive force of course, for it confines and restricts man's God-given right to pursue constructive ends.

Leonard was not sailing with the prevailing wind when he set up a foundation and began to search out the ways of peace and expound the freedom philosophy. On the contrary, force appeared to be everywhere in the ascendant, and the tide of socialism was swelling. The year was 1946. World War II had just ended, and leaders of great nations met to parcel out lands and peoples as if they were medieval fiefs. Communism came on the heels of the Red Army to eastern Europe, and all opposition parties were being crushed. China was in the midst of civil war which would shortly usher in Communism there. A Labour Government was recklessly destroying the remnants of free enterprise in Britain. The New Deal had fastened massive government intervention on the United States, and the powers of government had been vastly expanded in the course of the war. Readers of trends would surely have concluded that the future belonged to the greatest concentrations of force.

Yet if Leonard Read despaired, he never let on. Hysterical jeremiads were not his forte. Quietly, calmly, and with a superb confidence in the superiority of right and reason, he set out to find those of like mind, provide them with a forum from which to speak and write, develop a literature of freedom in the American vernacular, and do such a good job that others would be drawn to the ideas of a free market, individual liberty, limited government, and the moral values which undergird them. Leonard Read sought to do all things with grace, charm, gentle persuasion, and right reason. He was always concerned more to fortify those of like mind than to intimidate the unwilling into acquiescence. Under his leadership, F.E.E. became an intellectual tower for free enterprise.

Though there is much yet to be done, there are now signs that Leonard's efforts, along with those of many other individuals and organizations, are beginning to bear fruit. But, win or lose, his was a noble cause, and it has ennobled those working in it. Well done, Leonard Read. And Rest In Peace.

THE INAUGURATION OF DR. THOMAS C. STANTON, PRESIDENT OF FRANCIS MARION COLLEGE

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, on April 7, 1984, I had the pleasure of participating in the inauguration of Dr. Thomas C. Stanton as the new president of Francis Marion College in Florence, S.C.

Dr. Stanton is only the second individual in the college's history to hold this important position. The first president, Dr. Walter D. Smith, dedicated 13 years of his life to insuring that the students of the Pee Dee Region of the Palmetto State receive the best education possible. He is to be commended for the outstanding service he rendered to Francis Marion College over the years, and we thank him for a job well done.

Mr. President, we welcome Dr. Stanton to South Carolina and I am confident that he will continue the tradition of academic excellence which Francis Marion College has achieved in its relatively short history. Dr. Stanton has held numerous positions both as a professor and administrator at the college level in this country and abroad. Most recently, Dr. Stanton was the vice president for academic affairs at James Madison University in Harrisonburg, Va. His past experiences make him highly qualified to assume the presidency at this institution, and I predict that his leadership will prove to be a valuable asset to the bright future of Francis Marion College.

During the inauguration ceremony, Hon. Richard W. Riley, Governor of South Carolina, and I delivered salutations from the State of South Carolina and the U.S. Senate respectively. Following these remarks, Dr. James A. Rogers, chairman emeritus of Francis Marion College, delivered an address entitled, "The Making of a College" which told the interesting history of Francis Marion College from its founding in 1970. The inaugural address was offered by Dr. Ronald E. Carrier, president of James Madison University. Dr. Carrier's address was an eloquent discourse on the importance and the accomplishments of public colleges in our Nation. After being presented with the Presidential Medallion, Dr. Thomas C. Stanton made a fine response and accepted the charge to be the second president of Francis Marion College.

In order to share more about this outstanding college and its new president, I ask unanimous consent that the program and addresses delivered by Dr. Carrier, Dr. Rogers, and Dr. Stanton at the inauguration ceremony be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY DR. DONALD E. CARRIER, PRESIDENT, JAMES MADISON UNIVERSITY

(Inauguration of President Thomas C. Stanton, Francis Marion College, April 7, 1984)

Thank you. I am most appreciative of the great honor Francis Marion College is bestowing on me today and I am equally grateful for the opportunity to take part in this all-important occasion—the inauguration of a respected colleague and a good friend, Dr. Tom Stanton.

As president of James Madison University, I feel a special kindredship and affection for Francis Marion College. Both of these splendid institutions provide that most precious commodity of all—education—to the young men and women of Virginia, South Carolina and other states of our nation. They are learned institutions and, as President James Madison observed, "learned institutions ought to be the favorite objects with every free people." There is, Madison said, no freedom without education and he pointed out: "What spectacle can be more edifying or more seasonable, than that of liberty and learning, each leaning on the other for their mutual and surest support . . ."

There is a closer tie between these two institutions a state apart, however. They are both public colleges. And public colleges have been the backbone of the American system of higher education. America's success is due, in large part, to the role public colleges and universities have played. Allan W. Ostar, president of the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, put it succinctly when he said: "Public colleges and universities are the springboards from which generations of students have taken their places as respected citizens and important contributors to American society."

The American system of public colleges and universities is unique in the world. We provide higher education to each and every young man and woman who has the potential to acquire additional knowledge. Our intricate and widespread educational system covers a broad range of educational opportunities for Americans. The complete picture of higher public education is composed of many pieces: the state universities, the land-grant colleges and universities, the regional colleges and universities, liberal arts colleges, urban institutions, specialized public colleges, community colleges. Each of these segments is joined to form the complex, highly-successful system that we have. Each of the types of institutions fills a particular role, a particular niche in the total scheme of public higher education. There is a particular type of school—a particular school—designed to fit the needs of every qualified young man or woman who wants higher education.

There is no question that the American system of higher public education is working—and working well. We have had a plethora of national reports issued recently which seem to find fault in our overall system of education. While it is true that some improvements certainly can be made, I question if we've said enough about what is right with our system.

There are plenty of things that are right. Every day, we read of young Americans in their early 20s who are already millionaires because of some brilliant advance they made in technology. We read about 12 and 13-year olds who are so bright they're going into master's or doctoral programs at our leading universities. They were educated in American schools. I will also remind you that the high school dropout rate has declined from 39 percent of 14 percent today.

In comparing the American system of education to other nations, we must remind ourselves that the American educational system is an egalitarian one. Educational systems in most other countries are purely elitist systems. We open education to everyone. We aim to make higher education available to the average student, as well as the extremely bright one. Other countries quickly weed out the less talented students and make advanced education available only to a chosen few. So when you compare "average" students, you are speaking of other countries.

The success of our system of public higher education has been built on two factors: access and quality. We give all students with potential the opportunity to go on to higher education. We offer a broad diversity of different types of public institutions. We bring educational institutions to locations where students want to matriculate. There is an easy access to higher education in our country. Any student who wants to further his or her education has the opportunity to do so through easy access to higher education.

Complementing that access to higher education is a program of high quality. We not only give students easy access to education, we give them access to an education of high quality. Some of the greatest institutions in our country—some of the greatest in the world—are the public colleges and universities of the United States. The record of success by graduates of public institutions speaks for itself. Studies have proven that the persons most likely to achieve greatness are those graduates of the public institutions.

But public higher education does more than just produce enlightened Americans. It does more than teach Shakespearean sonnets, more than making Cobol and Fortran understandable, more than unraveling the mysteries of DNA. America's higher education system—in particular its public system—has made a signal contribution to the American society, one that stands out above all others. It has provided social mobility.

Nothing else in American society has been the equal of higher education in providing social mobility. Many nations of this world bind a young man or woman forever to the class, the level, in which he or she is born. You can achieve no more than your parents achieved in many societies. Advancement, economically or socially, is impossible in many systems. Some systems have been engineered—part by accident, part by design—to insure that the "have-nots" will never gain the wealth, power or comfort of the "haves." Other societies have allowed a modicum of social advancement through devices such as an apprenticeship system. In many places, the military often serves as an escalator from one social or economic class to another.

In America, we have prided ourselves in making this social mobility possible through the acquisition of higher education. We give each person the opportunity to go just as far as his or her capabilities and talents will allow. We do not hold people artificially at levels below their abilities. We allow them to fly—to reach as high as they can. And we do it through our system of public higher education.

You have here two people who have taken full advantage of the social mobility offered through education. Two college presidents—myself and Dr. Stanton—both came from humble roots to achieve the presidency of institutions of higher learning. My beginnings were in the tobacco fields of east Tennessee; Dr. Stanton's were in the cotton fields of South Carolina. But American society did not tie us forever to the tobacco fields and the cotton fields. Through the social mobility offered by education—and, in Dr. Stanton's case, also through the military—we were able to upgrade our position in life. Such cases have been repeated thousands and thousands of times in American history. The capability for such social mobility will continue to exist so long as our system of public higher education remains in place and continues to receive our support and encouragement.

Our system of educational diversity not only provides society with social mobility, it also guards against an individual's skills and knowledge becoming outdated in a rapidly-changing world. Higher education has the responsibility to help people avoid obsolescence in our society.

America's success in today's high technology revolution will depend not on the military, not on big business, not on industry. It will depend on how well American higher education reacts to the changing world of science and technology. And it will depend on how well higher education anticipates further changes, and thrusts, in our society.

There is an obligation for public education beyond the full-time students that are enrolled on its campuses. There is a responsibility to the communities and areas in which our colleges are located. Public colleges and universities must make educational opportunities available to wider and wider circles of citizens. We must all develop a variety of continuing education programs and shoulder the responsibility of expanding the educational horizons of the citizens in our regions.

I call on you today to give your full support to Dr. Stanton and to Francis Marion College. It is not enough to just pay lip service to your support of the institution and its new president. Your support must be total. It requires a commitment to lend all your energies, enthusiasm and emotions to the support of the College.

With Dr. Tom Stanton, you have a great leader. You have a man of vision, enthusiasm, dedication and intelligence. But he cannot do the job alone. You must be a full partner to Dr. Stanton in the development of this institution. All of you must be willing to sacrifice and make a total commitment—students, faculty, staff administrators, board members, alumni, students' parents and friends of the College. With this effective meshing of talents and skills, you can reach new horizons of success at Francis Marion.

I ask you not to consider today's activities as an inauguration. Instead, look on it as a commencement. It is a commencement—a beginning—of an era which can bring success and prosperity to Francis Marion College. Together, you will succeed.

Thank you.

THE MAKING OF A COLLEGE

[For the inaugural of Dr. Thomas C. Stanton as second President of Francis Marion College]

(By James A. Rogers)

Long ago, in ancient Rome, Julius Caesar said to Cicero, "It is a nobler thing to enlarge the boundaries of human intelligence than those of the Roman Empire."

That is what this institution is all about, and that is the purpose which has gone into the making of a college.

Twenty-eight years ago, there came into sharp focus the historic neglect experienced by this region of South Carolina in reference to opportunity for enlarging the boundaries of human intelligence through the presence of institutions of higher learning.

We drew an imaginary line from Charleston through Orangeburg to Columbia and thence to Rock Hill. Within the territory on our side of that line, representing approximately thirty-five per cent of the state's land area, there were but two colleges offering baccaulareate degrees—Coker College at Hartsville, and Morris College at Sumter, both small liberal arts institutions, one church-related for black students, the other private and at that time for women only.

In contrast, on or beyond that line, there were twenty-four colleges and/or universities. Thus it became dramatically apparent that college opportunity was heavily and prejudicially weighted against this region of South Carolina.

Among other things this meant tragic loss of a large reservoir of young talent going elsewhere to engage in occupations or professions following graduation from institutions beyond the region.

There then began quietly and in a very small way efforts to correct an imbalance which had worked so long against us. That became the genesis of the University regional campus system which has now spread across the state. The Florence branch was the first. It was a small, almost primitive, beginning. A freshman call of fifty-two students enrolled in the fall of 1957. The ground floor of the Florence Public Library, hastily converted into classroom, laboratory, library, and administrative office was the total physical facility.

In 1958, a sophomore class was added, and in 1959 came a dramatic and successful effort to obtain funds for constructing a first building on a land gift of 100 acres.

In 1961, what is now the J.Howard Stokes Administration Building was completed as an all-purpose building housing class-rooms, laboratories, faculty and administrative offices, student center, and library.

Called then the University of South Carolina at Florence, it continued as such for thirteen years. In 1969, the State General Assembly, in its wisdom, authorized its advancement to a four-year, state-supported college independent of and separate from the University. As has often been said, this was the first time South Carolina had established a new state college in the 20th century, or since 1896 when South Carolina State College in Orangeburg was founded.

Though the roots of the college are in that initial thirteen year period of University affiliation, its real beginning as now constituted came in July, 1970, when it officially came into existence as a baccalaureate institution with a new name and its own independent administration under its own Board of Trustees.

When you begin with only an idea and work your way through all the steps necessary for building an institution of credibility, merit, and distinction, you experience the romance involved in the making of a college.

I remember well, as do some of you, that first inaugural in October, 1970, when Dr. Walter D. Smith was officially installed, in public ceremony, as the first president of the college. There was little present except challenges, and they lay in every direction.

The first convocation had been held in the Florence's First Presbyterian Church. It was my birthday, and I remember looking over the sanctuary filled to capacity with a charter student body and thinking what a delightful birthday present this was.

In remarks earlier made on an official occasion, I had quoted from John Ruskin to lay down a principle and a philosophy to guide in building the college.

"When we build," I quoted him as saying, "let us think we build forever. Let it not be for present delight nor present use alone. Let it be such work as our descendants will thank us for; and let us think as we lay stone upon stone, that the time is to come when these stones will be sacred because our hands have touched them, and that men will say as they look upon the labor and the wrought substance, 'See, this our fathers did for us' ". That has been the guiding principle in the making of this college.

To the original 100 acres, 209 have been added, to make a campus of 309 acres. Among the very first moves was the development of a master campus plan designed for visionary land use—a plan that would serve well the present but would also look far into the future. There was much to consider—the location and spacing of buildings, the type and compatibility of architecture, the development of streets, sidewalks, parking, and playing fields. There was the matter of water acquisition and sewage disposal—all part of converting an old plantation of land grant property into a college campus designed and developed for creating and maintaining a pleasant and inspiring learning atmosphere.

You have around you today the results. On this April day of a spring burgeoning into leaf and bloom, design and beauty are spread across the campus in every direction, in vistas that speak of labors that built not for the present alone, but as Ruskin advised, forever.

But more important than physical design was structuring into the institution a soundness of academics for insuring that this would be a place for broadening the bounds of knowledge and understanding with firm rootage in the liberal arts tradition.

That meant faculty, curriculum, library, laboratory, and solid commitment to high standards of excellence in the teaching and learning process.

It has been this combination of a well-planned and esthetically developed campus, on the one hand, and superior academics, on the other, that has placed Francis Marion College in high standing among undergraduate institutions of higher learning in the Southeast. This combination has gone into the making of the college from that hot day in July, 1970, when Francis Marion moved into history until this day of a second presidential inauguration.

It is therefore well that this milestone event in college history be also an occasion to celebrate the college and the high place it has come to occupy among South Carolina's institutions of higher learning.

So many have been involved in the events of the years leading to this day that one hesitates to single out any for special mention. But the late Dr. J. Howard Stokes must not go unmentioned. He was the first to declare in favor of building a college, and to that end through the remainder of his life he pursued that objective with unceasing vigor, enthusiasm and commitment. He spent about as much time on behalf of the college as in the practice of opthalmology, a profession in which he was highly skilled. His name will be forever associated with the founding years of this institution.

Nor can one fail to speak of the work of Dr. Smith, the founding president, now president emeritus. So wise and professional was his leadership, and so completely was he dedicated to stamping excellence upon every phase of institutional development that the college as you see it today stands in totality as eloquent testimony to his wisdom and guiding hand.

Neither must one overlook the understanding, support and generosity of the State Legislature and successive governors, including the one honoring us with his presence today. The support of state officials has been one of the most rewarding components in making the college. When specific requests pertaining to Francis Marion College have reached the floor of the House of Representatives or the Senate, there has never been a negative vote cast. I hope, and believe, Governor Riley, that you will help maintain that unique record.

We come now to a new period in the history of the college with the installation of the second president. The presence of our own faculty and the representatives of so many institutions of higher learning, all dressed in academic regalia, helps to make this not only a colorful but also a truly historic occasion. So does the presence of such a large company of others of you who are here not only to see a new president installed but because you, too, wish to celebrate a liberal arts college which in so short a time has become so important in broadening the base of learning opportunity.

The years until now have been romance all the way. Many of us love every foot of ground on this campus, and we wish that the mission of the college may never stray significantly from its commitment to liberal arts and to excellence in all its academic programs. That is a legacy from the beginning years, a heritage which reflects an ancient wisdom that among the noblest purposes is enlargement of the bounds of human intelligence by pursuing knowledge in a broad range of intellectual disciplines.

We wish for Dr. Thomas Cousar Stanton the wisdom to so direct the affairs of his presidency that this institution may build solidly upon the foundations which have been so carefully crafted during the beginning years, and thus carry forward the romance of beginning into all the years ahead.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS

(Dr. Thomas C. Stanton, President, Francis Marion College)

Thank you, Mr. McMaster and Dr. Breazeale, for this handsome medallion and thank you, Mr. Berry, for the charge you so ably delivered. I greet you and all members of the State College Board of Trustees.

Senator Thurmond, Congressman and Mrs. Tallon, Governor and Mrs. Riley, Mayor and Mrs. Pearce, we appreciate your being here to share with Francis Marion College this exciting occasion. I am pleased also to see Comptroller General Morris here as well as Senator and Mrs. Leatherman. It is also nice to have here our own Representative Billy McLeod, the only Francis Marion College graduate in the South Carolina General Assembly. And on the platform today is the founding president of FMC, Dr. Walter D. Smith. Dr. Smith, may I ask you to stand and be recognized for the 13 years of your distinguished presidency.

As I listened to the magnificent 282nd U.S. Army Band play its stirring pieces, I realized that, although I got out of the Army, the Army is not yet completely out of me.

I am glad, also, to see my friends from Virginia and James Madison University. Much of what I hope to accomplish at FMC will have had its roots in the experiences I gained with my colleagues in the Commonwealth of Virginia and particularly from those members of the faculty, staff, and student body at James Madison University. My debt to all of you is enormous and I pay a special tribute to James Madison's President Ronald E. Carrier who gave me the opportunity some eight years ago to serve one of America's greatest universities in one of its most senior positions. I am glad; also, to acknowledge the presence of the delegates from other colleges and universities as well as those from the learned societies. We welcome you.

I am always inspired in the company of our distinguished faculty, and I enjoy the occasions when I can meet and carry on work with the faculty. To the Francis Marion College students who are here today, let me tell you how invigorating your presence is. There is something about your vitality and your enthusiasm that regenerates me. When I walk through the Commons and have chance encounters with you, I acquire new enthusiasm and greater optimism. I want also to acknowledge the presence of our administrators and staff and all the others of the FMC family who make this college a going operation day after day. Ladies and gentleman, to all of you who have come today as our guests, we welcome you sincerely.

I express my gratitude to the Inaugural Committee that did the work to make this occasion possible. The Chairman of the Committee, Dr. William H. Breazeale, Jr., can be singled out for thanks because his devotion, his tireless efforts, his imagination, and his ability to gain cooperation are typical characteristics of the members of that Committee. Mr. Hyman of the State College Board of Trustees, and himself a member of that Committee, stated that it was one of the hardest working Committees he had ever been on. Their work has brought us to this moment.

In reflecting upon all the events that have brought us to this moment, I want to acknowledge the presence of my family here today. My mother, who reared her sons from the depths of the Great Depression that gripped this Pee Dee area a half century ago, is here today. To her this platform must seem far away from that Dillon County farm on which she struggled so hard to give us a start. But as far away as it is, the shadows and ghosts of the experiences there are lurking over us still. They remind us that we are shaped equally by the hard and the pleasant experiences of life.

Before going further, I wish to express gratitude to my own family, my wife of 34 years and our two children. My wife Sara has given of herself faithfully, generously, and totally. Her constant devotion, her encouragement, here steadfast companionship, and her remarkable strength of character have sustained the children and me as we have moved around the world in my various careers. Along the way, she has sacrificed her own opportunities so that we could have ours; and in the process she has taught us the true meaning of love.

PHILOSOPHY OF EDUCATION

Today, I want to say something about my philosophy of education. Plato said, "Education is the process of giving the body and the soul all the beauty and all the perfection of which they are capable." What a lofty thought! Yet I prefer the definition that was given by President Garfield. He said, "Education is a student on one end of a log and Mark Hopkins [1] on the other." I am not sure what President Garfield really meant. However, I can supply my own interpretation. Education begins when a master teacher brings the mind of an eager learner on a level with his own. Also, in the Garfield characterization, education takes place in a spirit of mutual respect and humility.

My own educational philosophy is based in part on the awe in which I hold the universe and all its inhabitants—past, present and future. When one considers the age of creation, probably sixteen billion years, and the age of modern man, roughly 50,000 years, it is inescapable that civilization as we know it is both quite recent and without guarantees—and may indeed be most tentative. Education, then, is that noble process by which we inquire into the secrets of our worlds and search for suitable means for achieving harmony between ourselves and our environment.

An educated person has developed these skills of inquiry. In addition to intellectual skills, I believe education should equip us with social skills and with physical skills. These would not be complete without proper attention to moral development. Consequently, my educational philosophy centers on the development of the whole person in every aspect.

Said differently, education should enable one to know something and to do something. In my view, it is not a question of either a liberal education or job-oriented knowledge; rather, the question is one of preparing people to deal with the totality of life's challenges.

Out of this philosophy grows my profound commitment to honor, to a mandatory liberal arts base in every curriculum, and to a strong student life program. Blending together these activities allows the student to form character, to grow intellectually, and to develop socially. There is no comparable excitement to that of observing students in an honest search for knowledge and growth. As they press against the stubborn frontiers of ignorance and discover every so often that there is a mometary yielding and that slight victories can be gained, their optimism for humankind is quickened. No joy matches the joy of seeing a person discover the power of his or her mind.

How can we translate this philosophy into our work-a-day world at Francis Marion College? It begins with the faculty. (I suppose it really begins with a log.) We must have a faculty that is committed to the development of people and to the carrying on of those programs of faculty development that will keep our storehouse of knowledge replenished and up to date. To insure the presence of a gifted and distinguished faculty, we will press hard for fair and adequate salaries, and, of equal importance, we will insure the best possible conditions under which the faculty can teach, study, and conduct their research. We will strive for excellence. The failure to choose excellence is all it takes to produce poor performance. As Oliver Cromwell put it, "He who stops being better stops being good."

On the other end of the log are our students. The work we do for our students is not just important; it is urgent. Time is the enemy of us all. Some of my grammar school teachers were born in the nineteenth century; our present students will live most of their lives in the twenty-first century. Indeed, some of today's kindergarten students will be FMC's first graduates of the twenty-first century. We must prepare our students for a world where changes are occurring at exponential rates. H. G. Wells said, "Human history becomes more and more a race between education and catastrophe."

Preparing our students for an uncertain future is not limited to classroom work. We have to provide them with opportunities to grow as persons. More on-campus housing will give us a stronger sense of community. It will also make it easier for us to develop a richer social life. College should be a time for athletics, for dances, for dating, and for falling in love. It should be a time when people learn to handle relations with each other; and it should be a time to learn to change a relationship when, sadly and inevitably, some of them turn sour. In short, we are intent upon educating the whole person.

How successful will we be at Francis Marion College? Unfortunately, no one has any facts about the future. So we do not know how successful we will be. If I answer that question from hope, I can say we will be very successful. If I answer that question from faith, I can say we will be very successful. If courage, and hard work, and dedication, and integrity, and cooperation count for anything, we will be very successful.

Can we guarantee success? If so, how? Often to break the monotony of my jogging, I construct little vignettes and entertain myself by rethinking them as I pound the FMC sidewalks early every morning. Dream with me for a moment. In one of my fantasies, I see a long line of civilization marching up to the bar of the Great Judge. He asks one questioin of each person in turn. "Did your life have meaning?" Some answer "yes" and are sent in one direction. The ones who answer "no" are sent in another direction. At the end of the day, I have the opportunity to go up to the Great Judge and ask him why it is that some people answer "yes" and some answer "no" when both had the same experiences. All had exactly 24 hours a day. All were equal in biological makeup. All had certain talents and abilities. All had opportunities for love, and work, and service. But for some, life had meaning; for others, it did not. The Great Judge's answer was, "Life has only that meaning which we bring to it."

That tells me that we can claim the future if we put meaning in our lives. We can contribute to advancement of civilization. We can add to the accomplishments of humankind. We can grow as creatures of a moral universe, and we can make FMC reach its potential. Yes! We will be successful here.

We need daily to put meaning into the life of this institution. Remember: Institutions have no integrity except that which its people bring to it, nor does it have compassion, nor vigor, nor purpose, nor character, until those qualities are brought to it by the people in it. The meaning of FMC will be exactly that which you and I, Board members, government officials, faculty, staff, students, alumni, and friends bring to it.

The meaning I see for this institution is reflected in a statement attributed to the English essayist of the nineteenth century, John Ruskin.

'The entire object of true education is to make people not merely do the right thing, but enjoy the right things; not merely industrious, but to love industry; not merely learned, but to live knowledge; not merely pure; but to love purity; not merely just, but to hunger and thirst after justice."

Mr. Berry, members of the State College Board of Trustees, faculty, staff, students, alumni, ladies and gentlemen, by the guidance of Almighty God, I accept the charge to be the second president of Francis Marion College.

THE NATIONAL WIC EVALUATION

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, within the next few months we will be faced with the job of extending the authorization for virtually all of the Federal nutrition programs, including the special supplemental feeding program for women, infants and children (WIC).

Just recently, the Reagan administration submitted its proposed legislation to reauthorize the WIC program. This administration's proposal is to cut the percentage of funds permitted to be used for administrative purposes, eliminate the current provision of law which requires funds to be reallocated if States cannot use them, and to reauthorize the program for only 1 year at a funding level that would force thousands of participants off the program.

At the same time that we are asked to consider this proposal, the Department of Agriculture has refused to share with the Congress any information regarding the preliminary results of the most comprehensive evaluation of the WIC program done to date—a study that is costing the taxpayers in excess of $5 million. As a part of the national WIC evaluation, the Department has received an analysis of the impact of WIC on preschool children, on the effect of WIC on birth outcome, and on the quality of past evaluations of the program. However, they have refused to make this information available to the Congress or to permit the principal investigators to discuss their findings publicly.

One needs only look at the record of this administration on the WIC program to surmise what is going on here. For fiscal year 1982, President Reagan proposed to revise the budget submitted by President Carter to cut President Carter's request by 32 percent. This would have reduced average monthly caseloads by one-third in fiscal year 1982. President Reagan also proposed at that time that spending for WIC be frozen at a reduced level through fiscal year 1986. If that effort had been successful, WIC caseloads would be less than half of what they are today. For fiscal year 1983, this administration proposed to terminate the WIC program by converting it to a block grant. For fiscal year 1984, the proposal was to cut participation by almost one-third, and for fiscal year 1985, the proposal is again to substantially cut caseloads.

One can assume then that the findings of the National WIC evaluation do not support the jaundiced view this administration has of the WIC program, nor do they support this administration's continued effort to cut participation in the program. That is why USDA is so reluctant to let this information set the light of day.

Mr. President, the WIC program has enjoyed broad bipartisan support in the Congress as is evidenced by the consistent defeat of President Reagan's proposed cuts in the program. That support is well deserved. An evaluation of the Missouri WIC program by the Missouri State Center for Health Statistics which, incidentally, was rated by the principal investigator of the National WIC evaluation as "* * * the most credible and well done (evaluation) we have reviewed" found that WIC participants had significantly longer lengths of pregnancy, that mean birth weights increased with increased length of participation, and that low birth weights are reduced by WIC participation. In addition to the significant health benefits found in the Missouri study, the investigators found significant evidence of the cost-effectiveness of WIC. WIC participation was found to be associated with a significant reduction in medicaid newborn costs. The Missouri WIC study found that for every dollar spent to provide the program for the more than 6,000 participants involved in the study, $1.42 was saved in reduced medical costs during the first 30 days of the newborn's life. These savings would obviously be even much greater if they were to take into consideration savings derived from the prevention of costs of remedial or chronic care resulting from catastrophic health problems.

Mr. President, I am confident that the results of the National WIC evaluation as submitted to the Department will confirm the positive findings of the Missouri study. I only wish I could be so confident that that information will be forthcoming from USDA in a timely manner.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article by Elizabeth Wehr which appeared in the April 21, 1984, issue of the Congressional Quarterly regarding this subject be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Congressional Quarterly, Apr. 12, 1984]

FOOD PROGRAM DATA WITHHELD FROM CONGRESS

(By Elizabeth Wehr)

A respected academic researcher who has new evidence that a federal food program for the poor markedly reduces infant deaths has been told by the Reagan administration that he may not discuss his findings with members of Congress.

The evidence comes at a time when Congress is considering what to do with the program, called WIC, which provides milk, fruit juice and other nutritious food to three million pregnant and nursing women, infants and preschool children. Authorization for the program expires in September.

The House has already begun debating a bill (HR 7) that would reauthorize WIC for four years while nearly doubling its current $1.3 billion funding. House advocates of WIC, such as George Miller, D-Calif., say the increase is needed because many people eligible for the food do not get it. (Weekly Report p. 890)

The Senate Agriculture Committee will meet May 2 to vote on a bill (S 2545) by Chairman Jesse Helms, R-N.C., to extend WIC for a year, with no increased spending. Helms believes WIC has yet to prove its worth. Sen. Robert Dole, R-Kan., chairman of the panel's Nutrition Subcommittee, will advocate a four-year extension.

Even though they must decide this spring on how much money to spend on WIC, members may not see the results of the $5 million WIC evaluation until this fall. Officials at the Agriculture Department's Food and Nutrition Service say it cannot be released until then because it must be thoroughly reviewed by experts. The study is the first national evaluation of WIC since 1974.

The study is of unusual interest because of its magnitude and because the principal investigator, Dr. David Rush, was hired by an administration that sought a 30 percent cut in WIC spending in 1981. Since then, it has opposed growth in the program. Congress has consistently rejected the administration's WIX funding proposals.

When Rush was put in charge of the project in 1981, some advocates for the poor thought—mistakenly, Rush says—that he was a "hired gun," recruited to shoot down WIC.

Rush, a professor of pediatrics and of obstetrics and gynecology at Albert Einstein Medical College in the Bronx, describes himself as a hard-nosed investigator. His earlier work had cast doubt on the value of another food program for impoverished mothers and he has publicly criticized the methods of certain studies favorable to WIC. Given his skepticism, Rush's positive findings are noteworthy.

Meanwhile, Helms has been publicizing a General Accounting Office (GAO) finding that earlier WIC studies offered no strong proof that the program worked.

When he outlined his work at a March 15 hearing of Helms' committee, Rush said he had preliminary findings, "potentially of profound importance," that he had hoped to discuss. But, he said, he could not do so until he had the Agriculture Department's (USDA) approval. Rush also declined in an interview to say what he had found, other than to characterize it as "encouraging."

Congressional Quarterly has learned that Rush's preliminary analyses indicate, among other things, that WIC has had impressive success in cutting fetal and infant mortality. The largest impact is among blacks and among the least-educated participants in the program.

At the same hearing, Helms focused on a GAO statement that existing WIC research was "insufficient for making any general or conclusive judgments about whether the WIC program is effective or ineffective overall." GAO also said, however, that there was favorable, if inconclusive, evidence that the program worked.

Still, Helms said, "I would be hopeful that after 10 years, there would be more supportive and conclusive evidence to demonstrate whether this program is worth over $1 billion of the taxpayers' money each year or not."

There are conflicting views on whether Rush's work is in such an unfinished state that it must be held back. Rush was eager to talk about it to the Senate panel.

It is routine for academic researchers to discuss their early findings with colleagues, informally and at meetings, well before publication and even before the peer review that precedes publication. The early feedback, Rush says, is essential. "There's a virtue to telling what you know, and letting people pick away at it."

Conducting research on contract for a federal agency is a different matter with, in this case, very different stakes. Rush likens it to building a nose cone to Defense Department specifications, which the department then owns.

But sometimes agencies allow their contract investigators to share preliminary information with Congress when legislation is pending.

The basic designs of Rush's study were scrutinized and approved by a USDA panel of independent experts. USDA officials also closely monitored the execution of the work. Such controls suggest that review would not turn up major problems. Rush predicts "there will be no changes, no reversals" in his basic findings.

Rush also says he's been sending along data and analyses to the department since December and that, in some cases, he has already responded to technical critiques made by USDA.

The department paints a different picture. John Stokes, Food and Nutrition Service director of analysis and evaluation, said reviewers might decide on interpretations different from those of Rush. Noting Rush is technically a subcontractor to a North Carolina research institute that oversees the project, Stokes said, "he is not the ultimate guy here."

Stokes also said Rush had missed deadlines and that what he sent was "preliminary, I mean, cut and paste. Marginal notes. Many sheets of printout data."

When Rush testified, "we had nothing that anybody would be able to read," Stokes says. "Can you imagine him going up there and saying, 'here are the results,' and we didn't even know what he was going to say?"

ARMENIAN MARTYRS DAY

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in recognizing the 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children who were massacred by the Turkish Ottoman Empire between 1915 and 1923. By designating today as Armenian Martyrs Day we honor the memory of those who suffered and died. We also call the attention of all Americans to this tragedy so that similar atrocities can be prevented in the future.

At the beginning of World War I, about 2½ million Armenians were living in the Ottoman Empire. In 1915, in the midst of the war, a desperate and disintegrating Ottoman Empire turned on its Armenian population. Armenians throughout the Ottoman Empire were deported on short notice. Men were usually separated from their families and murdered. The women, children, and elderly who remained were marched to the Syrian desert and constantly attacked by "guards" who were supposed to offer protection. Most of the deportees were massacred or died of starvation, disease, or exposure. Thus, the Armenians of the Ottoman Empire were virtually eliminated from their ancestral homeland through a carefully executed government plan of genocide. Today, fewer than 100,000 declared Armenians reside in Turkey.

Unfortunately the world did not soon enough learn a lesson from the Armenian genocide and it became distressingly clear that history does repeat itself when lessons are not learned from past tragedies. There have been too many acts of man's inhumanity to man during this century. Besides the slaughter of the Armenians, the 20th century has seen the Soviet-induced Ukrainian famine of 1932-33 which caused the starvation of 7 million Ukrainians, the Holocaust of the Jewish people in World War II, and the recent massacres in Cambodia. Eli Wiesel, a survivor of the concentration camp at Auschwitz, once said, "Memory is our shield, our only shield," to protect mankind against a repetition of the slaughter. Hopefully, events like today's commemoration of the Armenian genocide will help make the memory of these atrocities the strong "shield" that it should be.

CONGRESS SHOULD ENCOURAGE AND INSURE NUCLEAR POWER DEVELOPMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, it is no secret that the nuclear power industry in this Nation is in danger of extinction. Last year, Ralph Nader's extremist antinuclear group, Critical Mass, proudly displayed an impressive scoreboard of the nuclear plants it had shut down or stopped in progress or even in the planning stage. Their tactics are simple—to misinform the public, with the assistance of the media, and convince them that nuclear power is unsafe. They frighten their listeners with the unseen and the unknown. The people of France, Japan and the Soviet Union live with nuclear power every day, and they accept it as an integral part of their lives. But in the United States, emotion has ruled this debate, and so some very good nuclear research projects, such as the Clinch River breeder reactor, face uncertain futures, mired in the quicksands of misinformation, and it is estimated that it now takes 12 years to bring a nuclear powerplant on line.

The irony of this debate is that those scientists that work most closely with energy are the strongest proponents of nuclear power. I enclose for the Members attention an article entitled "Scientists Favor Nuclear Power While Press Is Highly Skeptical," which appeared in the May 1983 edition of Nuclear Industry, the monthly magazine of the Atomic Industrial Forum. While that is hardly an objective organization about nuclear power, the article highlights the studies of Prof. Robert Lichter of George Washington University. Professor Lichter's research addressed a Roper Organization, Inc. poll which showed that a quarter of the American people believed a majority of scientists were opposed to further development of nuclear energy by conducting a poll of his own of the scientists themselves. His conclusions were startling, and demonstrated the disparities that plague nuclear power development. He found glaring disparities between:

The great confidence shown by most scientists in nuclear power, and the great lack of confidence shown by the media;

The pro-nuclear scientists who observe the peer-review protocol before speaking out, and their anti-nuclear colleagues who speak out at the sight of a microphone; and

Journalists of a more conservative persuasion and their colleagues whose antinuclear tendencies vary in proportion to their liberalism.

The disparity in the media is overwhelmingly biased, however, in its opposition to nuclear power, which contributes to the public misconceptions about its cost, safety, and necessity to meet future energy needs. Every so often, that bias is tempered by a thoughtful editorial position such as that which appeared on April 18, 1983 in the Blade, which publishes out of Toledo, Ohio. The editorial examines the cost to the American economy of an eroding nuclear technology that results from misinformed public fears. It points out that U.S. manufacturers are increasingly being frozen out as international suppliers of nuclear technology due to the ever increasing expertise of nations like Japan and France. The editors conclude with the warning that decades from now, we may dearly regret letting the technological advantage slip from America to France and Japan. I share their concerns, and hope that this body and the people of this country recognize the vital importance of the safe and continued development of nuclear power to our energy future. I have enclosed a copy of the Blade's editorial also.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the material to which I have made reference.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCIENTISTS FAVOR NUCLEAR POWER WHILE PRESS IS HIGHLY SKEPTICAL

ATLANTA.—A political scientist had some keen observations on why nuclear power wins such low acceptance in the village square, pointing up to the AIF's public affairs conference here April 13-15 why industry's strategies to combat this situation have taken on such urgency.

To Prof. Robert Lichter of George Washington University, research showed that nuclear power's image suffers from some glaring disparities between the great confidence shown by most scientists in nuclear power, and the great lack of confidence shown by the media; the pro-nuclear scientists who observe the peer-review protocol before speaking out, and their anti-nuclear colleagues who speak out at the sight of a microphone; journalists of a more conservative persuasion and their colleagues whose anti-nuclear tendencies vary in proportion to their liberalism.

PERCEPTION OF DIVISION

People without scientific expertise depend on their perceptions of what the experts think, said Lichter, who is also a fellow of Columbia University's Research Institute on International Change, and many of them perceive a significant division among experts on the viability of nuclear power.

A poll taken by the Roper Organization Inc. found that a quarter of the American people believed a majority of scientists were opposed to further development of nuclear energy.

To find out what scientists really think about nuclear power, Lichter and his colleagues sent out a 14-page questionnaire to a "stratified" random sample of 1,000 scientists listed in American Men and Women of Science. Seventy-four percent responded. Separately, they sampled scientists who were energy experts and nuclear energy experts.

The results, first published in Public Opinion magazine, showed that scientists favor continued development of nuclear power. Given four options—fast development, slow development, halting development, and dismantling current plants—only 10 percent of the randomly selected scientists would halt development or dismantle plants.

HIGH DEGREE OF SUPPORT

Support was higher among those scientists best able to deal with the factual questions involved in energy issues. Among energy experts, 70 percent favored fast development, 25 percent slow development, 4 percent would halt development, and 1 percent would dismantle. Support was highest among nuclear experts, where 92 percent would proceed quickly, 8 percent would proceed slowly, and none chose the more negative courses.

The same level of support was reinforced by several similar questions asked of the scientists. For example, two out of three scientists consider nuclear power risks to be acceptable, as do three out of four energy scientists, and 99 percent of nuclear power experts. The poll was taken slightly over a year after the Three Mile Island accident.

The reasons scientists are so supportive of nuclear power is that the majority of them consider the energy shortage serious, and expect energy usage to double in the next 20 years. In looking at which sources of energy will contribute to energy needs, the scientists listed nuclear after coal and oil. The energy experts were far less hopeful than the general public for contribution from biomass or any form of solar energy. No more than 2 percent of the energy experts look to these sources to provide a large contribution in the next 20 years.

"Most scientists in America believe there is a need for more energy, that there are relatively few places to get it, and that nuclear power is an acceptable source, given the risks," said Lichter.

With the scientific community so supportive of nuclear power, the survey looked at why the public perceptions are so different. The survey looked in two areas: the willingness of scientists to speak out, and the receptivity of the press to the message.

The survey findings were that the majority of scientists, as well as the majority of pro-nuclear scientists, agree in principle that scientists should speak out only in their areas of expertise. Anti-nuclear scientists, however, disagree with that statement by eight to one.

Among all scientists, 80 percent want prior peer review before a scientist takes his findings to the press. Among anti-nuclear scientists, a bare majority, 55 percent, agrees.

Anti-nuclear scientists are three to four times more likely to publish on science policy in non-professional journals than are other scientists, said Lichter.

Even though anti-nuclear scientists publish more often, there are many more pro-nuclear scientists. So Lichter looked at the other half of the equation: that journalists might pay more attention to anti-nuclear scientists. Science writers who worked for major media outlets were surveyed.

The findings were that science journalists were less than one-third as likely as energy scientists to believe that nuclear plants are very safe. A majority of energy scientists agreed that current plants are very safe, while only one in six key science writers agreed with this, said Lichter.

The "prestige" science journalists were also surveyed. The Washington Post, The New York Times, television networks and their opinions of nuclear power were even lower than those of the key science writers.

"The milieu of the newsroom is clearly more critical of nuclear energy than is the milieu of the scientific laboratory," observed Lichter. Other findings:

While 90 percent of scientists believe the contribution from nuclear will be large in the future, only two out of five science journalists agree;

Asked what problems they believe are serious, science journalists are more than twice as likely as scientists to believe that accidents and release of radioactivity are major problems;

Science journalists are five times as likely as scientists to think radiation exposures to workers are a major problem;

When asked if scientists had the expertise to solve the technical problems, scientists were four times as likely as science journalists to agree;

Asked to rate certain groups as poor, fair, good, or excellent, 43 percent of scientists rated nuclear plant licensees good or excellent, about 43 percent poor or fair, and some were undecided. Only 9 percent of science journalists, however, rated nuclear plant owners positive.

Most critical of all were reporters and producers of public television.

Attitudes toward nuclear power transcend energy issues, said Lichter. There is a significant correlation between attitudes toward nuclear power and political liberalism. The more liberal, the more critical of nuclear power.

"The best predictor of anti-nuclear power attitudes is the belief that American social institutions are unjust," he said.

People can make decisions on nuclear power based on factors other than scientific expertise, said Lichter. When the heads of major anti-nuclear organization were asked what factors they thought were most relevant to dealing with nuclear energy, they picked environmental, moral, and social factors far more than scientific/theoretical or engineering/technical ones. Scientists believe it is mainly a scientific and energy problem.

Lichter said he and his colleagues are just beginning a long-term study of the way major media outlets and science journals covered nuclear power.

One way to cover the issues is to get an anti-nuclear group like the Union of Concerned Scientists to comment and a pro-nuclear group like the Atomic Industrial Forum. This was used in a recent Time magazine article, about nuclear power: "An Industry Still in Disarray." It quoted Eric van Loon, head of the UCS, and Carl Walske, president of the AIF.

One problem with this is that it may inadvertently give the impression that scientists are against nuclear energy and industry is for it, he said.

CEA'S COUNTERATTACK

Harold Finger, new president of the U.S. Committee for Energy Awareness, explained to the conference how new methods will be used to convey an old message: while other forms of energy usage have declined since the Arab oil embargo in 1973, electrical usage has increased in lock step with economic growth and will be essential to continued economic expansion. Further, industry considers nuclear power an essential partner with coal in providing for future generation.

The basic case that CEA plans to make to the public and politicians is that electricity is the basic fuel for economic growth. Since 1973, industry has cut back on its overall demand for energy by 18 percent. However, it has increased its demand for electricity by 10 percent. Similarly, since 1973 the nation's economy has grown by 18 percent while energy usage has declined by 5 percent. However, the basic relationship between Gross National Product (GNP) and electric power demand has persisted, with every increase in GNP accompanied by at least an equal increase in electric power demand.

This means that if the economy begins to grow by 3 percent a year, the growth in demand for electrical power will also probably increase by 3 percent. This would mean a need to double electrical output in only 24 years, the equivalent of six hundred 1,000 megawatt plants.

Coal is not limited by supply in the near term, but by the demands of mining, shipping and burning in power plants. "Few energy experts believe that coal alone will be able to meet all of our future electric power needs," said Finger. "Coal needs a partner—and a competitor—for the electrified age of tomorrow."

NEEDED: A CONSENSUS

Before making multi-billion dollar decisions on power plants that can take from 8 to 14 years to build, utilities need something approaching a national consensus and a broader understanding by the public and by policy makers of the stakes involved.

The fundamental importance of electric power to our national well being is not widely understood, said Finger. Nor is the fact that nuclear power is not a hypothetical energy source for the future, but a proven technology that has fueled much of our economic growth over the past decade.

"Getting the message out systematically to policy makers, opinion leaders and the general public—all of whom seem to underrate the role of electricity and nuclear energy to provide it—is our number one goal," said Finger.

CEA plans different approaches than industry has used in the past, with advertising probably the most significant.

The job isn't promoting nuclear power alone, but working to enhance the credibility of utilities, said Finger. He also said that if the Institute of Nuclear Power Operations, which promotes uniform excellence in plant construction, training, and operations, doesn't begin talking about its efforts on the outside, CEA will have to begin talking.

To reach beyond advertising CEA has hired Burson-Marsteller, one of the world's largest public relations firms, to set up a system of task forces made up of specialists in media relations, government and community relations, spokesperson training, speech and technical writing, and other communications disciplines.

The firm has 11 offices around the country in locations that roughly parallel clusters of nuclear plants; this means the company can help with the inevitable brush fires as well as with the strategically planned program.

EARLY "SITE APPROVAL"

CEA will also identify problem areas and work on them. CEA will have to get in early where potential waste sites are located or the anti-nuclear people will get there first and industry could lose, said Finger.

A review of the status of grassroots pronuclear groups was given the meeting by Florence Mangan, a licensing engineer at Westinghouse Electric Corp., who is head of Nuclear Energy Women.

Since 1979 their memberships have increased three-fold, their mailing lists have swelled, they have learned how to get some funding, and they have become closer to political decision-makers and the media.

Yet they are experiencing difficulty in motivating themselves and are using words like "malaise, low morale, and apathy," said Mangan.

The reasons are: some believe they will have difficulty getting funding because some funding sources feel that contributing to CEA and INPO is enough; some feel they lack a visible, specific problem to solve; and they question whether they are really needed or not, and whether they are appreciated.

First, Mangan suggested that the groups may be mirroring "our concerns about the future of the industry and they are doing the same with their membership."

She called this a "very happy problem" for an industry struggling with too much work to do. She suggested that utilities contact the grass-roots groups with specific suggestions of tasks they can do, give them a sense of purpose and a small amount of money or services-in-kind, and allow them to maintain their independence.

WHISTLEBLOWERS AND PROGRAMS

At a session on whistleblowers, a Nuclear Regulatory Commission official said the agency typically finds a higher number of complaints and allegations about companies that have poor programs for soliciting employee safety concerns.

Additionally, said James O'Reilly, administrator of NRC Region II, it is evident that many safety concerns are taken directly to the NRC because the concerned individual was never informed of the resolution of an issue he had previously raised with the licensee.

Also, said O'Reilly, a good licensee program must include a recognized supervisory bypass system for the individual who doesn't believe the first point of contact—usually his supervisor—has or will adequately address the concern, or won't address the concern without retaliation.

A great deal of sensitivity in dealing publicly with allegations of whistleblowers was cautioned by Gerald Charnoff, a partner in the law firm of Shaw, Pittman, Potts & Trowbridge.

Simply ignoring or denying the accusations initially can have severe public relations, as well as legal repercussions, said Charnoff. Should the whistleblower be proven correct in any way, these postures only serve to undermine the company and the industry's credibility, including the public's perception of management's interest in building and operating safe plants. Further, the company may be subject to all sorts of adverse NRC findings, up to and including shutdown of a licensed facility.

WHEN IN DOUBT, CHECK

When a whistleblower alleges deficiencies in a plant, the utility and the NRC should quickly determine if there are any safety or quality assurance issues, said Charnoff.

If the whistleblower's charges are substantiated, this should be thoughtfully and accurately reported to the press, the whistleblower rewarded, and the public told of changes to alleviate the concerns.

Where the charges are not substantiated, the NRC and the media "must be courageous enough to report the fact. It is not enough, as the NRC has been inclined to do, to report that a complaint has not been substantiated. If there is no basis for the charge, it ought to say so. If there is no safety significance to the charge, it ought to say so."

Where there is smoke, there is often no fire, said Charnoff. "The demonstrated performance of nuclear whistleblowers frequently has been poor."

". . . There is reason for irritation at the inordinate amount of government and industry time and money sometimes fruitlessly spent pursuing endless numbers of accusations which eventually are proven false or unrelated to a legitimate health and safety concern. And we need not be embarrassed to focus the spotlight of publicity on the misuse of whistleblowers by the anti-nuclear movement."

Whistleblowers are a fact of life and will not go away, said Charnoff. They are well protected by law and are well publicized by the media.

NEED FOR EAST ACTION

Government investigators need procedures to quickly submit to the licensee the substance of the allegations and to allow the utility's senior management, in the presence of the NRC, to talk directly with the whistleblower, he asserted. Only in this manner can the utility move quickly from innuendo and sensationalism by the media, determine what the facts are, be candid with the media, and brief the public on the existence or absence of a problem and plans for resolving outstanding concerns.

Like O'Reilly, Charnoff said employers must be sure that their companies have a mechanism for employees to air complaints within the organization, without feeling that reprisals will follow or that their complaints will be ignored.

One method of doing this is to publicize to its employees the accessibility of a company ombudsman, who would be a mid or senior level manager assigned to hear health and safety grievances. Ideally, the ombudsman would be outside the line supervision of workers directly engaged in safety-ralated jobs.

To some extent, this ombudsman could undercut the effectiveness of line management who want to be the first to hear an employee's concerns, said Charnoff. "This potential negative repercussion is more than offset by the need to ensure that employees are aware of the presence of an accessible open door that has no strings attached to it."—John O'Neill

WHAT PRICE APATHY?

The continued strong growth of nuclear power in countries like France and Japan, documented in a recent study by the Atomic Industrial Forum, raises disturbing questions about America's ability to remain self-sufficient in nuclear power technology.

It is no secret that in contrast to the situation abroad, these have been lean years for the four American companies that manufacture nuclear power plants. Poor economic conditions have dampened demand for electricity and made the financing of new power plants painfully expensive.

As a result, electric utilities have been canceling plans for new nuclear plants en masse. In the last eight years manufacturers have received only three orders for new facilities. The vendors' order books have been empty since 1979. And economists predict that the dearth of orders may continue for years.

The inevitable consequences of this drastic cutback will be an eroding of the critical base of skilled manpower and technological know-how that enabled American industry to excel in nuclear power plant design. Indeed, most plants under construction abroad are based upon designs and technology originally developed in the United States.

But ironically, foreign manufacturers like France's Framatome and Japan's Hitachi and Toshiba are boasting that their nuclear hardware now actually may be superior to U.S. hardware. And other countries appear to be heeding those boasts, because when smaller nations embark on a nuclear power development program, they tend to buy hardware from French or Japanese vendors. Granted, the governments in countries like France often do underwrite the financing of nuclear power plant exports. But the effect is the same.

American manufacturers are being frozen out as international suppliers of nuclear technology. At the same time, there are no new orders for domestic plants. How long can this situation continue without inflicting serious damage on America's ability to manufacture its own nuclear plants?

Wendell A. Johnson, president and chief operating officer of the Toledo Edison Co., raised exactly that kind of question last Wednesday at a University of Toledo engineering symposium.

"With no new plant orders, what will become of the major vendors?" he asked. "Fifteen years from now will we be able to assemble a design and construction team to build nuclear plants? Or will we become dependent upon the expertise of the French or the Japanese to help us build the next generation of power plants?"

The irony about the American public's preoccupation with sometimes baseless fears about nuclear power safety is that it obscures questions like these that so urgently demand answers and remedial action.

Concerns about safety need to be balanced with concerns about the long-term viability of this industry. At present, nuclear energy appears to be the only practical source of electrical energy for industrialized societies of the future. Decades from now, we may dearly regret letting the technological advantage move from America to France and Japan.

NICARAGUA

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, this is not a routine request to enter something in the RECORD.

In connection with the security situation which confronts us in Central America, indeed the economic consequences of failing to meet that properly, as well as the security consequences which confront us daily, as we continue our necessary debate on how to confront our deficits, I invite the attention of my distinguished colleagues, all of whom, like me, are capable of rendering judgments only on the basis of the information they receive, this rather significant article.

It is an article in today's Washington Times, entitled "U.S. Officials Black Out Anti-Sandinista Rally." The article is by Phil Nicolaides of the Washington Times. I will read four paragraphs and ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

On Good Friday, a crowd of some 100,000 Nicaraguans thronged the plaza in front of Managua's National Cathedral for three hours to express, in the words of ABC's Peter Collins, "their passionate solidarity with the Catholic Church and opposition to the Sandinista regime." Some 8¼ million Americans watching the ABC-TV Evening News last Friday witnessed the event and heard the veteran network correspondent report it.

But if Americans had to rely on all other news sources singly or combined, they would never know it happened.

And if Americans had to rely on the State Department, they would be told it didn't happen.

None of the wire services carried the story or transmitted a single photograph to their hundreds of subscribers. None of America's newspapers reported it. Neither did NBC or CBS.

In summary, the rest of the article says that top administration officials confirm that such an event did take place, and there were erroneous reports on the part of people in our Embassy down there that it did not take place.

I ask my colleagues, as I shall do, to study carefully what is going on here.

Bishop Obando y Bravo went before the crowd and said, "Free Nicaragua! Christ forever!" He is a man who originally sympathized with the Sandinista regime, and he was at the forefront of that rally.

This is a very important piece of information for us. I happened to speak to that bishop and to the editor of La Prensa, whose father was killed by the Somoza people, and this heroic son is being threatened with death by the Sandinistas.

So I hope that we can recognize that this information is not only a presentation of information but also the withholding of information as characterized by the title of the book "Despite" and this is something we should all direct our attention to and try to sort out.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD this article which I previously mentioned.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. OFFICIALS BLACK OUT ANTI-SANDINISTA RALLY

(By Phil Nicolaides)

On Good Friday, a crowd of some 100,000 Nicaraguans thronged the plaza in front of Managua's National Cathedral for three hours to express, in the words of ABC's Peter Collins, "their passionate solidarity with the Catholic Church and opposition to the Sandinista regime." Some 8¼ million Americans watching the ABC-TV Evening News last Friday witnessed the event and heard the veteran network correspondent report it.

But if Americans had to rely on all other news sources singly or combined, they would never know it happened.

And if Americans had to rely on the State Department, they would be told it didn't happen.

None of the wire services carried the story or transmitted a single photograph to their hundreds of subscribers. None of America's newspapers reported it. Neither did NBC or CBS.

When The Washington Times asked State Department spokesman Joseph Becelia for information about the demonstration, he said he had not heard of it and would have to telephone the U.S. Embassy in Managua for a report. U.S. diplomats in Managua had apparently not cabled to Washington anything about the huge demonstration.

Quoting Roger Gambel, the deputy chief of the U.S. mission, Mr. Becelia sharply challenged the accuracy of the ABC report. "This was not an anti-Sandinista demonstration," he said. "By no means—neither in its origin nor in its nature."

When pressed to explain the loud chants from the crowd and the placards clearly visible on the television screen in the Collins report, Mr. Becelia replied that "any anti-Sandinista character or manifestations were peripheral to the religious nature of the gathering—although there may have been scattered anti-government shouts and a few placards."

He also said the crowd numbered "only 50,000, not 100,000." The larger figure, he said, "was a church estimate."

An ABC spokesman said, "Our crowd estimates were based on a careful review of the capacity of the plaza—the size of two football fields—and the density." In fact, he said, "some church officials were saying the crowd numbered 200,000. That 500,000 figure you got from the embassy is a Sandinista estimate. I don't know why anyone would take it as reliable."

A top administration official said the handling of this affair by the American embassy in Managua "unfortunately confirms the view of some of us that our 'experts' are not expert enough. It casts new light," the source continued, "on the reasons the Kissinger Commission was so dissatisfied with the attitudes and the abilities of our people down there."

A highly placed White House source, told of the State Department explanation, called it "absolutely incredible—those embassy people must be asleep at the switch."

"A disgusting performance," was the reaction of a former high government official closely involved in Latin American policy matters. "But the problem goes beyond embassy ineptitude," he said.

"The real question is why is State's Bureau of Inter-American Affairs putting this curious negative spin on events in Nicaragua which should be playing into our hands and supporting our position?

"It took great courage for those people to join in such a tremendous popular manifestation," he said. "They risked being physically attacked by the turbas divinas [divine mobs]—Marxist goon squads who frequently assault people, even in church buildings, when there is any complaining about the regime."

ABC News officials stood by their story. One reporter on the scene said the State Department's attempt to downplay the political significance of this event—the people of Nicaragua rallying around their church and their bishop in defiance of the Sandinista regime—must be because they don't know what's going on, or don't want to know.

"Anyone who saw what we saw and heard what we heard would have grasped the fact that this was an outpouring of religious fervor, but also that feeling was directed against the regime, which has been fighting the church. The leaders of the demonstration, Bishop Obando y Bravo and Father Bismarck Carballo, are symbols of resistance and frequent targets of the Sandinistas," the network reporter said.

One of the frequent chants, ABC, said, was, "'We are Christians, not Marxists.' That ought to tell you something."

A high administration official confirmed this account and agreed that the State Department's view was "way off base." He recalled how American embassy staffers in Moscow "showed the same kind of blindness when they failed to read the unmistakable signs that Yuri Andropov had died. Dusko Doder [of the Washington Post] filed the story, and eight hours later our embassy there was still denying it," he recalled.

Some highlights of the original ABC report:

"The crowd of 100,000 . . . led by Archbishop Obando y Bravo, in an exquisite rebuff to Sandinista leaders who had said he was out of touch with the people. . . shouted, 'Free Nicaragua!' and 'Christ Forever!'

"None of the Sandinista leaders was present. Most are declared atheists. In a defiant gesture, the march was organized by Father Bismarck Carballo, the director of communications, a priest the regime tried to discredit last year. . . The church has begun to take on the role of the church in Poland. It is becoming the focus of opposition to the Sandinista regime.

"No police were present, because the Sandinistas know the church is the one force that can rally the people against the government. For their part, the church leaders said nothing against the regime, but emphasized the need for Catholic faith which here, as in Poland, means 'No' to Marxism."

Two days after the demonstration, the bishops of Nicaragua issued an Easter pastoral letter sharply critical of the regime. The letter was bitterly attacked in the government controlled newspaper Barricada for failing to condemn "North American imperialism," and for urging the regime "to enter a dialogue with the murderers of our people."

The bishops' letter was one of the strongest ever issued by the church against the Sandinista regime. It condemned press censorship, the detention of political prisoners, violence against the Indian minority, restrictions on religious freedom, and the collapsing economy which has caused acute shortages and rationing.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Alabama (Mr. DENTON) for bringing to the attention of the Senate the account found in the Washington Times of April 26 under the byline of Phil Nicolaides.

I know the distinguished Archbishop Obando y Bravo, a leader of the Catholic Church in Nicaragua. I met and visited with him at length as part of the Kissinger Commission investigation and finding of facts which took us to Nicaragua in October of last year.

I must say that I have not had as many opportunities in my life to see brave people as the distinguished Senator from Alabama. As a matter of fact, clearly, I have not had an opportunity to be brave as he was as a prisoner of war for over 7 years. The distinguished Senator has far exceeded what I have done and hopefully would have to do.

But I suggest that the subject of the article, this man, Archbishop Obando y Bravo, is a true hero. And I think he is in danger every day of his life in Sandinista Nicaragua, just as we were in danger in Somoza's Nicaragua.

I am delighted that the archbishop presided over or was part of this rally of the faithful that was reported by ABC and then repeated here in the Washington Times, because I think that the international visibility does give him an opportunity to survive in Sandinista Nicaragua, which is, with the passage of each day, growing more and more an armed camp, with no basic freedom whatsoever. It is more and more like Nazi Germany in its beginning days, really, than anything else.

I do not know why we seem to get multiple versions of every little item that happens in Central America when it is against the interests of those we are trying to help. For instance, we, properly, learn about every deficiency of the new democracy that is trying to establish itself in El Salvador, but it is so difficult for us to get news about what the Sandinista Commandantes are doing to freedom-loving individuals and the churches in Nicaragua.

I commend the Senator for putting us on notice here, and, while I am not an expert on embassies, or ambassadors, which are good and which are not, I concur that the Embassy in Nicaragua just has to report events more objectively and more fully than they have in the past.

I was not very pleased with what I saw there when I went down for that visit to Central American countries. Here again, I do not know how the Embassy could miss 100,000 Nicaraguans meeting with church leaders, not Nicaraguan Marxist leaders, but merely church leaders and others outside of the Government. How we could miss reporting that from our Embassy is something rather significant, especially since the cry of the meeting was a simple one—freedom and Christ. I guess these Nicaraguans are trying to tell us that some of their leaders are trying to do away with these ideals in that country. Both freedom and Christ would be replaced by Marxism and Sandino.

So I commend the Senator for bringing this meeting to our attention.

CENTRAL AMERICAN POLICY

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, a year ago our distinguished colleague from Connecticut, Senator CHRIS DODD, carefully addressed the issue of Central America and told us where the President's policy was taking us. It was a tough statement and it created a lot of controversy. And it created a lot of controversy because Senator DODD had the guts "to tell the emperor he had no clothes" and a lot of folks around Washington thought that was improper, if not downright impolite.

Improper and impolite, well, I for one wish we had been a lot more improper and impolite on the issue of Lebanon. If we had, we might have saved a few hundred American lives. But we were not and those lives were lost.

Let us not do in El Salvador, or in Central America what we did in Lebanon or in other misguided military adventures. Let us not rely only on a military solution to complicated problems. That was Senator DODD's message a year ago to the American people, and it is a message that is well worth repeating. Let us use our trade markets to bring a needed stimulus to the stagnant economies of Latin America. Let us take advantage of the political options open to us, for example, the Contadora process. Let us take advantage of the negotiating framework established by some of our closest allies in this region—Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama. And let us do it before the quagmire of a military solution in Central America closes around us and we are left to claw our way out.

For those who need a roadmap on how to get from here to there, I urge them to take another look at Senator DODD's statement delivered April 27, 1983. And, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of that statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRATIC RESPONSE TO PRESIDENT REAGAN'S ADDRESS TO JOINT SESSION OF CONGRESS

(Remarks delivered by Senator CHRISTOPHER J. DODD)

Good evening. I want to thank the networks for the opportunity to offer a different viewpoint. While there is no unanimity in Congress—on either side of the aisle—on Central America, tonight I am speaking for the many Americans who are concerned about our ever-deepening involvement in the military conflict in that part of the world.

I am pleased to note that the President this evening was willing to recognize an economic and political dimension of the problems in Central America, including the possibility of negotiations. Concerned Members of Congress have been pressing this point of view since he came to office. Regrettably, however, as his statement tonight demonstrates, the fundamental view continues to emphasize military problems and the search for military solutions.

In the months and years that follow this evening, after the applause has faded and the ringing phrases are forgotten, Americans will have to live with the choices we make in this fateful time of decision.

In the past, we as a nation have learned painfully that the truth is never as simple as some would paint it. Charts and statistics can be used or misused to prove any side of a case. And speeches can sound very good without being very right.

So first of all, let me state clearly that on some very important things, all Americans stand in agreement.

We will oppose the establishment of Marxist states in Central America.

We will not accept the creation of Soviet military bases in Central American.

And, we will not tolerate the placement of Soviet offensive missiles in Central America—or anywhere in this hemisphere.

Finally, we are fully prepared to defend our security and the security of the Americas, if necessary, by military means.

All patriotic Americans share these goals. But many of us in Congress, Democrats and Republicans, respectfully disagree with the President because we believe the means he has chosen will not fulfill them.

Those of us who oppose the President's policy believe that he is mistaken in critical ways. To begin with, we believe the Administration fundamentally misunderstands the causes of the conflict in Central America. We cannot afford to found so important a policy on ignorance—and the painful truth is that many of our highest officials seem to know as little about Central America in 1983 as we knew about Indochina in 1963.

I've lived with the people in this region. Let me share some facts with you about Central America.

Most of the people there are appallingly poor. They can't afford to feed their families when they're hungry. They can't find a doctor for them when they're sick. They live in rural dirt shacks with dirt floors of city slums without plumbing or clean water. The majority can't read or write. Many of them don't even know how to count.

It takes all five Spanish-speaking countries of Central America more than a year to produce what this nation does in less than three days. Virtually none of even that meager amount ever reaches the bulk of the people. In short, a very few live in isolated splendor while the very many suffer in shantytown squalor. In country after country, dictatorship or military dominance has stifled democracy and destroyed human rights.

If Central America were not racked with poverty, there would be no revolution. If Central America were not racked with hunger, there would be no revolution. If Central America were not racked with injustice, there would be no revolution. In short, there would be nothing for the Soviets to exploit. But unless those oppressive conditions change, the region will continue to seethe with revolution—with or without the Soviets.

Instead of trying to do something about the factors which breed revolution, this Administration has turned to massive military buildups at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars. Its policy is ever increasing military assistance, endless military training, and further military involvement. This is a formula for failure. And it is a proven prescription for picking a loser. The American people know that we have been down this road before—and that it only leads to a dark tunnel of endless intervention.

Tonight the President himself told us that things were not going well in Central America. But for this the President cannot blame Congress. We have given him what he has asked. $700 million in economic and military assistance has been delivered or is on its way to El Salvador since Ronald Reagan came to office . . . all at his request, and all with Congressional approval. One of every five Salvadoran soldiers fighting for its government was trained right here in the United States. American soldiers are there now training Salvadoran army units which are employing modern weapons built in American factories.

Now the President asks for an even greater commitment. His requests for El Salvador alone will bring the total aid to that country during his term to more than $1 billion.

One billion dollars to counter a rebel army that, according to all reports, does not exceed 7,000 guerrillas. That means you are paying $140,000 in hard-earned tax dollars for each one of those guerrillas we are trying to defeat.

While your tax dollars have been pouring into El Salvador, the money skimmed off by that nation's rich is leaving the country. For every dolar we've sent in, more than a dollar has gone out—to numbered accounts in Zurich or to buy Wall Street stocks. It raises the question of why we should invest in the future of El Salvador when the wealthiest citizens of that country are investing in Swiss banks.

What return have we achieved for all we have spent? The army in El Salvador has been reluctant to fight—and it is led by an officer corps working a nine-to-five shift with weekends off. Land reform has been abandoned. At least 30,000 civilians have been killed, and the majority of them have been victims of the government's own security forces. American nuns and labor advisors have been murdered—and the judicial system is so intimidated that it cannot even bring accused murderers to trial.

For those 30,000 murders, confirmed by our own embassy, there have been fewer than 200 convictions.

American dollars alone cannot buy military victory—that is the lesson of the painful past and of this newest conflict in Central America. If we continue down that road, if we continue to ally ourselves with repression, we will not only deny our own most basic values, we will also find ourselves once again on the losing side. It is folly, pure and simple, to pursue a course which is wrong in principle—in order to wage a conflict which cannot be won.

After 30,000 deaths, after hundreds of millions of dollars, with the ante going up, with no end in sight, and with no hope for any real change, the time has come for a different approach. Yes, we are fully prepared to be involved in Central America. But the question is the nature and quality of our involvement. We must offer an alternative policy that can work.

First, we should use the power and influence of the United States to achieve an immediate cessation of hostilities in both El Salvador and Nicaragua. Already in both those countries too many people have died. It is time for the killing to stop.

Second, the United States should use all its power and influence to work for a negotiated political settlement in Central America.

In El Salvador, the rebels have offered to negotiate unconditionally. Let us test their sincerity. We certainly have the leverage to move the government to the bargaining table. On his recent trip to that very Catholic region, the Pope lent the moral force of his office to such a step. It is practical and realistic to expect, that if we support it, these talks can get underway. And every major ally of ours in the region—Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, and Colombia—is anxious for such a step to be taken, and has offered to make the arrangements.

Those same nations have volunteered to bring Nicaragua into negotiations—and Nicaragua has agreed to talk. Instead, as we know from press accounts, this Administration is conducting a not so secret war inside that country.

No one in this Congress or this country is under the delusion that the Sandinista government is a model democracy or a force for stability. But the insurgents we have supported are the remnants of the old Somoza regime—a regime whose corruption, graft, torture, and despotism made it universally despised in Nicaragua. The Sandinistas may not be winners, but right now we are backing sure losers. We are doing for the Sandinista Marxists what they could not do for themselves. We are weakening the very groups inside Nicaragua which believe in a free and democratic society. And that is the sad irony of this administration's policy.

Third, we must restore America's role as a source of hope and a force for progress in Central America. We must help governments only if they will help their own people. We must hear the cry for bread, schools, work, and opportunity that comes from campesinos everywhere in this hemisphere. We must make violent revolution preventable by making peaceful revolution possible.

Most important, this approach would permit the United States to move with the tide of history rather than stand against it.

For us, the stakes are diplomatic, political, and strategic. But for the people of El Salvador, life itself is on the line.

I have been to that country and I know about the morticians who travel the streets each morning to collect the bodies of those summarily dispatched the night before by Salvadoran Security Forces—gangland-style—the victim on bended knee, thumbs wired behind the back, a bullet through the brain.

We recoil at such an image for our association with criminals such as these is not America's tradition. In other, brighter days we have stood for the aspirations of all the people who are part of the Americas. Two centuries ago, our nation raised the light of liberty before the world—and all of this hemisphere looked to us as an example and an inspiration. In this Capitol building from which I speak tonight, men like Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, and Abraham Lincoln once spoke of an America leading the way to human progress and human rights—and people everywhere listened with hope.

There is no greater or larger ideal than the one which was forged here in the early days of this Republic. That ideal of liberty is our greatest strength as a nation; it is a powerful and peaceful weapon against tyranny of any kind anywhere in this hemisphere.

We can take the road of military escalation. But we really don't know what the next step will be, where it will lead, or how much it will cost. This much, however, we do know. It will mean greater violence. It will mean greater bloodshed. It will mean greater hostilities. And, inevitably, the day will come when it will mean a regional conflict in Central America.

When that day comes—when "the dogs of war" are loose in Central America, when the cheering has stopped—we will know where the President's appeal for more American money and a deeper American commitment has taken us.

Thank you and good night.

ANSEL ADAMS

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, a celebrated artist, dedicated conservationist, and fellow Californian, Ansel Adams, died on Sunday, April 22 at the age of 82. I had the privilege of meeting Ansel Adams. His passing will leave a permanent void in the worlds of art and activism, his twin pursuits. For his devotees from both of those worlds, he leaves behind a legacy that will be honored, invoked, and built upon for years to come.

Mr. Adams' photographs are among the most admired and respected of any American photographer, past or present. He pioneered photographic techniques and a unique style that helped to transform photography from a novelty to an art form.

Ansel Adams' photographs of the American West not only changed photography, but also enormously expanded Americans' knowledge of their country. Literally millions worldwide who would never travel to or experience otherwise the beauty of California's Yosemite Valley, New Mexico's desert, and other wilderness areas, were permitted to do so through Mr. Adams' photographs. Through Ansel Adams' art and advocacy, there has come to be a wide awareness of and keen appreciation for the Western wilderness.

That awareness, coupled with Ansel Adams' environmental activism, brought about changes in the Government's attitude toward wilderness. In the 1930's, Mr. Adams packed up his photographs of Kings Canyon in California, came to Washington, and successfully lobbied Congress to make the area a national park.

Up until the moment he died, Ansel Adams remained active in photography and conservation. He often wrote to me to offer counsel and constructive criticism on environmental issues. I valued his opinion. I only wish he could have lived long enough to see the resolution of the longstanding controversy over the California wilderness issue. I hope we will resolve this impasse very soon, and can perhaps in some way properly honor Mr. Adams' memory in doing so.

Ansel Adams will not be forgotten. His memory will be cherished by all who knew him and his remarkable works.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, notwithstanding the previous order, that I may proceed for not more than 2 minutes as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMENDATION OF ELMER E. RASMUSON

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, ordinarily the leadership on this side would not proceed to the consideration of a matter until it has been printed on the calendar for 1 day. There have been two or three exceptions to that because of extraordinary circumstances, and in each case, I believe, the cloakroom on this side has notified Senators that the leadership intends to proceed in that manner.

Such an exception has appeared today and the cloakroom notification has gone out by hotline to Members on this side saying that it is the intention of the leadership to ask the Senate to turn to the consideration of a concurrent resolution on behalf of Senators STEVENS and MURKOWSKI, commending Elmer E. Rasmuson, retiring as Chairman of the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission.

The two Senators are especially anxious for this to be done as soon as possible.

Given the circumstances involved, given the fact that it is not a substantive legislative matter, and the fact that a hotline notification has gone out, I will now ask the minority leader if he has any objection to proceeding to the immediate consideration of this concurrent resolution.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, having been informed of the desire of the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished assistant majority leader, we on our side have run the telephones and we find no objection to proceeding with the concurrent resolution.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader. I am sure that the two Senators from Alaska especially thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a concurrent resolution on behalf of Senators STEVENS and MURKOWSKI and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution will be stated by title.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 108) to honor Elmer E. Rasmuson.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to speak in support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 108, a concurrent resolution honoring a great Alaskan resident, Elmer E. Rasmuson. This resolution specifically notes Elmer's significant contributions as a member and Chairman of the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission (INPFC), from which he will be retiring this June.

During the course of his 15 years on the INPFC, Elmer has been a principal force in the development and management of fisheries in the North Pacific. He has guided the INPFC toward achievement of its goals as stated in its protocol, and was instrumental in the recognition of that protocol in 1978. Elmer was the first Chairman of the North Pacific Fisheries Management Council and established that Council in the forefront of fisheries management in the United States.

In addition to his outstanding contributions to the U.S. fishing industry, Elmer, along with his gracious wife Mary Louise, has been a key citizen in the State of Alaska, in both the private and public sectors. He served as president and chief executive officer of the National Bank of Alaska from 1943–65, and then as chairman of the board until 1974. He is currently chairman of the Budget and Planning Committee of NBA. He is a past chairman of the Alaska Permanent Fund Corp. He served as mayor of Anchorage, Alaska's largest city, from 1964–67. Elmer also served on the University of Alaska Board of Regents for 19 years. He has received numerous awards and recognition for his many contributions to enhance the quality of Alaska lifestyle.

I am particularly proud to join with my colleague, the senior Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS), as an original cosponsor of this concurrent resolution honoring a great Alaskan.

I initiated my banking career in 1959 with Elmer Rasmuson's organization and was a member of National Bank of Alaska's official corporate family for some 10 years. I am deeply indebted for the valuable training and experiences gained under Elmer's direction.

Elmer Rasmuson's contribution to both the State of Alaska and this Nation has been most significant. Thank you Elmer and Mary Louise.

The concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. CON. RES. 108

Whereas, Elmer E. Rasmuson will retire as Chairman of the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission (INPFC) in June, 1984 after fifteen years of service on that body;

Whereas, Elmer E. Rasmuson has been a principal force in the development and management of the fisheries of the North Pacific;

Whereas, Elmer E. Rasmuson directed the INPFC toward its goal as stated in the protocol "to promote and coordinate scientific studies relating to the fishery resources of the North Pacific Ocean . . . and aid in the conservation of these fishery resources";

Whereas, Elmer E. Rasmuson was instrumental in the negotiation of the INPFC Protocol in 1978 which significantly advanced United States fishing interests;

Whereas, Elmer E. Rasmuson has commissioned the preparation of a history of the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission to promote the goals and purpose of the Commission; and

Whereas, Elmer E. Rasmuson served as the first chairman of the North Pacific Fisheries Management Council pursuant to the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, and established that council in the forefront of fisheries managment in the United States:

Now, therefore, be it Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), The Congress of the United States of America commends Elmer E. Rasmuson for his exemplary contributions to the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission and for the promotion of its goals and purposes.

Mr. BAKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have put out another hotline on this side saying that at or about 1 o'clock today, the leadership on this side may seek a unanimous-consent agreement that only certain listed amendments will be in order to the pending bill or the amendment thereto. I am not sure I can get that unanimous-consent agreement, but this statement is to place Senators further on notice as to that possibility that at 1, approximately, such a request will be made.

It is not meant to encourage Members to list amendments. Indeed, I hope some of the amendments that have been listed will be deleted. We are up to 28 now on this side, 10 more than we began with this morning, and

I do not know what the situation is on the other side of the aisle.

I advised the minority leader that I might make such a request and that I have put out such a hotline. I chose this moment to give Senators further notice of the possibility of such a request at that time.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the time for the conclusion of morning business extended has expired, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is correct. The time for the transaction of routine morning business is closed.

MISCELLANEOUS TARIFF, TRADE, AND CUSTOM MATTERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume the consideration of the unfinished business, which the clerk will state.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 2163) to amend the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

(Pending: Baker Amendment No. 3027, to further reduce deficits by including reconciliation provisions and appropriations caps for defense and nondefense discretionary spending for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987.)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE SYMMS BUDGET PROPOSAL

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am in the process, I announce to my colleagues, of getting my proposal to the floor, but I would first like to make a few comments about the budget process and the bill that is before the Senate today.

The proposal I would bring before the Senate will freeze all COLA's for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987 except for means-tested entitlement programs, which are exempted from the freeze. All nondefense discretionary programs will be cut 10 percent in budget authority, or program level where appropriate, below the fiscal year 1984 CBO baseline level of fiscal year 1985. Then, in 1986 and 1987, they will be frozen at that position and no civilian agency pay raises will be allowed in fiscal years 1985 and 1987.

In defense, Mr. President, we shall assume the revised President's defense request, since I have changed it from the proposal I offered in the Budget Committee, to reflect the numbers that the leadership package has agreed to except for one additional provision. There will be no DOD military or civilian pay raises in fiscal years 1985 through 1987. The plan also includes the assumption of a little additional money to assume that each senior executive staff employee will, in accomplishing these reductions and efficiencies with respect to Government, receive a one-time bonus of $20,000 in fiscal year 1984 and 1985 contingent upon budget cuts and efficiencies being achieved.

Mr. President, I offered that proposal in the Budget Committee. It did not receive much support. I offer it here this morning, not expecting that it is going to have a runaway support level, but I think it is something to which we should give serious consideration. It is an opportunity, a way to substantially reduce the budget deficit.

The proposal I offered in the committee actually reduced the deficit by about $181 billion.

It will incorporate slightly more reductions now because we are actually going to increase the cuts in defense over what I offered in the Budget Committee, because the CBO staff ran the numbers for me using the early, higher defense numbers of the President.

I offer this budget even though there have been months of hard work and negotiations by the leadership and the White House on a leadership package. I do not think there is any plan we can find as Members of the Congress on which we would get complete agreement. The deficit reduction package offered by the Republican leadership is a better alternative than the other major alternatives presented in the committee which all contained greater tax increases.

What disappoints me is that every time we talk about achieving savings in Washington, the recommendations for cuts are usually inequitable. About 27 percent of our total Federal budget is for defense, but defense is always asked to come up with the greater portion of the savings, while nondefense spending consumes 73 percent of the budget. We will continue to take more from the taxpayers by raising taxes, unless we agree to restrain the real budget boosters, which are the growing entitlement programs.

I was, as I said, disappointed but not surprised that the budget proposal which I put forward in the committee was rejected. I think it is unfortunate that Congress is always reluctant, particularly during an election year, to hold the line on spending. This budget plan would have frozen all Federal pay, benefit, and retirement checks at their current level for 3 years, exempting means-tested programs, thereby protecting those citizens at the poverty level. It would enact a 10-percent cut in nondefense discretionary programs from their 1984 levels, freezing the spending level in 1986 and 1987. And this plan would save $180 billion over 4 years without increasing any taxes.

Now, Mr. President, I am, as I said, revising those defense numbers. They are in the process of being compiled right now, so I estimate there will be an additional $16 billion or $20 billion more in savings which will be reflected in defense. Consequently, the deficit reduction would total more than $180 billion over the 4 years. But it achieves these savings without increasing any taxes and without reducing anyone's current benefit levels.

While some viewed this plan as harsh, I am convinced that it contained exactly the spending remedy that this economy needs to stay on the road to recovery. Although President Reagan's economic program has dramatically slowed inflation and increased employment, long-term interest rates will remain unacceptably high until Congress can demonstrate the political will to restrain ever-increasing transfer payments. To date, the political will for fiscal restraint has been virtually nonexistent.

In 1955, after both the Second World War and the conflict in Korea, the national debt stood at $273 billion. Before President Reagan submitted his budget in 1980, the national debt stood at $930 billion. During the time period that big spenders controlled both Houses of Congress, when the tax, spend, and elect mentality gripped our legislators, interest rates rose from 5 to 20 percent. Money drained from our capital markets could have built homes, refurbished antiquated factories and industries, and allowed young people to buy houses which they cannot afford today. Instead, this money was spent wastefully, on pork-barrel projects, on excessive regulation, and on grants and low-interest loans to Communist countries, while the American taxpayer was forced to pay the escalating prime interest rate. Thus, our taxpayers essentially get hit twice, once with taxes to pay for spending programs, and second, with the higher interest rates that accompany deficit spending. Congress big spenders spoke of compassion and urged more spending programs as a solution for perceived social ills. Yet there was little compassion or thought for the young people of today condemned to paying exorbitant interest rates on the debts which were incurred by a series of fiscally negligent Congresses.

The basic premises of the Reagan economic recovery program were sound. Excessive, anticapital formation taxes had depressed economic activity, the Federal Government had tended to rely on high rates of monetary inflation to finance increased spending, and expenditures had shifted at the national level from defense and capital resource investment to domestic social programs. The Reagan administration sought to reverse that dangerous trend with its accompanying negative impact on economic vitality, free enterprise, and individual initiative. The 1981 tax cuts were meant to leave more money in the hands of those who earned it, and by so doing, spur investment and economic growth. The basic assumption was that tax cuts are more effective in promoting economic growth than Government spending. This approach to economic growth is also termed supply-side economics, and is 100 percent consistent with the fundamental tenets of capitalism, the singular most successful economic system in the world.

But the Reagan economic program was watered down, as Congress diminished the tax cuts, and refused to restrain social spending. Today, we are confronted with the largest budget and the largest budget deficit in our history. The major media tends to incorrectly cite the President's tax cuts and the badly needed defense modernization program as the deficit culprits. The record does not show that that is the truth. The 1981 tax cuts, however, were largely obliterated by several revenue enhancement measures which followed their passage: changing the original Kemp-Roth 10-10-10 formula to a delayed 5-10-10 formula, the 1982 social security tax hike, the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act (TEFRA), a $100 billion package which promised to eliminate the deficit, and the $50 billion tax package which Congress just recently enacted. Indexing, the single most important tax reform achieved by the Reagan administration, has been preserved. But even indexing, which largely protects the middle and lower income families from the unlegislated taxes of bracket creep, has been under constant attack since its passage.

Clearly, the tax cuts have done little more than to stabilize the tax burden of the average American. Two decades ago, taxes amounted to about 18.7 percent of GNP. Tax collections in 1983 ran at about 20 percent of GNP. Federal spending, in contrast, increased in 20 years from 20 to 25 percent of GNP. The deficit is the consequence of excessive Government spending, not undertaxation. Although the President's tax stabilization effort has given new incentives for production and encouraged economic resurgence, the continued high rate of Federal spending threatens long-term recovery.

I think this is an opportunity for us, if we would vote for this amendment, to take a big step toward restoring confidence in this economy among the financial markets and among the people up and down Main Streets of America.

The defense budget, according to popular media misreporting, is responsible for the deficit, and antidefense forces urge that the defense budget take a disproportionate cut in comparison to nondefense programs which comprise 73 percent of the overall Federal budget. Defense, as a portion of the Federal pie has been sharply reduced from its 45 percent level during the Kennedy administration to about 27 percent during the current administration. Since President Carter's last year in office, nondefense spending has increased by $150 billion, the equivalent of 75 percent of our current deficit.

I would not contend that savings cannot be achieved in the Department of Defense. If Congress continues to enact arbitrary cuts, however, it only precipitates a reoccurrence of the problems that have plagued the Pentagon in the past—stretchout of procurement programs at uneconomic rates of production, decreases in readiness by restricting funding for operations and maintenance, foregoing modernization of our strategic and theater nuclear forces, and slowdowns of general purpose and naval force modernization extending already over long leadtimes.

The multiyear approach to defense program planning and budgeting deserves serious consideration. Our defense personnel system must be scrutinized. The All-Volunteer Force and the military retirement program are consuming over half of our defense budget, while in comparison the Soviets spend 11 percent of their defense outlays on personnel costs.

Congress has become fixated with micromanagement, and are overinvolved in decisions on specific weapons based on parochial interests. Congress has failed to provide the long-term program stability that is the key to curbing defense costs. Long-term program stability could cut 5 to 6 years out of the acquisition cycle and consequently achieve tremendous savings. Often, the Soviets are able to steal our technology, deploy, test, and repair their new weapons before the Pentagon can even secure a "yes" or "no" on a specific design from the Congress. This unpleasant truth is not reassuring to anyone concerned about our efforts to catch up with Soviet military superiority. The Soviets, with a GNP 80 percent less than our own, devote 15 percent of their GNP to defense allocations, while we spend 6.7 percent of our GNP for defense. I am pleased that this budget resolution provides adequate funds to continue our efforts to regain military parity with the Soviet Union. Last, the defense budget should never be predicated on budgetary priorities. It should be calculated to counter threats to our national security.

What has brought about the marked shift in Federal spending priorities away from national defense toward increased domestic social spending? The simple, compelling fact is that funding a strong national defense does not have the immediate political gratification that Congress receives from satisfying the demands of the expanding social spending constituency. Politicians discovered years ago that votes were easily bought with social programs and managed to sell their voting public on the outrageous falsehood that government, rather than the private sector, is the creator of wealth.

As a result, the United States has accumulated more debt in the past 13 years than in the first 175 years of the Nation's existence. Indexed benefits have been responsible for the majority of program growth in the decade of the 1970's. Although indexing was intended to counter the effect of inflation, it actually contributes to further price inflation since automatic multibillion dollar increases in income benefits fuel increased Federal spending and higher taxes. Today, nearly every major welfare, retirement, disability, and survivor benefit program adjusts benefits yearly—and some as often as semiannually—to reflect increases in some measuring index. Not surprisingly, entitlements have moved from 36.1 percent of the Federal budget in 1967 to a high of 59.1 percent in 1980.

H. L. Mencken once made a statement that Franklin D. Roosevelt thought the Federal Government was a gigantic milch cow with 100 million teats. It has also been said that government is the illusion that we can all live at someone else's expense. Under the guise of helping the poor and needy, a lot of money has found its way to government administrators, to statisticians, consultants, economists, sociologists, think tanks, and assorted social agencies. The big spenders keep asking for more money for social programs, without questioning how much of the resources intended for the unfortunate in our society actually reaches the source. Yet efforts to circumvent the welfare bureaucracy through block grants or cash payments are met with cries of indignation that the poor would be hurt by such direct aid.

Today's spendthrift politicians should heed advice that was offered by President Coolidge—

> We must have no carelessness in our dealings with public property or the expenditures of public money. Such a condition is characteristic either of an undeveloped people or of a decadent civilization.

Our Republic was created by men of vision, who believed foremost in individual and national freedom. Their premise was that a government composed of imperfect leaders exercising power over others should possess strictly limited authority. That unique concept led to an experiment in freedom that resulted in unparalleled economic growth and a standard of living unmatched by any other nation. That prototype of government has all but disappeared. We face a monumental decision as free people today—do we want continued expansion of the social welfare state and greater usurpation of individual freedom, or do we want to restore individual work incentives, fiscal restraint, and allow for a stable and prosperous economy?

This country has been infected with a sense of entitlement that feeds upon itself. Special interest groups and their beneficiaries are adept at pressuring Congress to enact new and expensive programs and to expand existing ones. I believe we should remember the one entitled group that is neither highly vocal, visible, or astute as lobbying Congress for handouts—the American taxpayers. The taxpayer is too often forgotten in our struggles for the disbursing of public funds.

There are several major initiatives that Congress should implement, and perhaps such will be attainable following the November elections. The balanced-budget concept was dismissed as naive in modern economics. The Federal Government's power to print money was abused, and monetizing the deficit seemed a harmless way to wipe out debt. The side effect was rampant inflation, reduced purchasing power, and economic disaster. I strongly support a constitutional amendment mandating a balanced budget, and restrictions on Federal spending authority to a realistic percentage of the gross national product.

Second, the President of the United States, no matter who he or she is, should be given line-item veto authority, which nearly all State Governors now possess.

Last, fundamental reforms to scale down the growth of the entitlement sector must be instituted, and the freezing of these COLA's and adjustments would be a good way to start.

There is a current pervasive attitude of defeatism about controlling spending in Washington. I find that the most frustrating part of being in the U.S. Senate. In fact, I find it intolerable. Members find enacting tax increases easier than addressing necessary spending reform. Our budgetary problems can only be solved by reassessing proper levels of Federal spending. Public awareness of the impact of higher levels of public spending is crucial to the redirection of national priorities—toward limited government, freedom for the American citizen, and the survival and competitiveness of the United States internationally.

Mr. President, that is why I offer this amendment today. It is why I offer it in the Budget Committee. I find that our problem is Government spending. Our problem is not that we do not have enough Federal revenues.

All we need do is take a look at the chart, and we can see that Federal revenues have increased consistently for the last 10, 15, or 20 years.

It is projected that we will have around $750 billion of revenues in fiscal year 1985. If we were to spend only $85 million an hour, which is all we were spending last year, we would have a balanced budget in fiscal year 1985. But $85 million an hour, no matter how much money it seems to be, is not enough to satiate the appetite of the Federal spending machine. This proposal calls for spending $100 million an hour.

Every hour that goes by another $100 million will be spent when this proposal comes into law. That is why I offer the amendment I do. It is probably too paltry, even though it will cut out over $200 billion in budget expenditures over a 3-year period without hurting national defense, although defense will carry part of this savings.

Mr. President, I now have a breakdown here on the numbers. There will, as I have stated, be no increase in revenues. In my original proposal, there were $27 billion in defense savings and now there will be another $40 billion added to that approximately, so there will be about $70 billion in defense savings, and $132 billion in nondefense savings, coming up for a total of over $200 billion with no tax increases.

So this is something substantive for any of those who wish to have an opportunity to vote for a budget which would mandate additional savings in defense over and above what is contained in this leadership package. This plan would freeze military pensions, military pay, and Department of Defense civil servant pay for a 3-year period, as would all Federal employees' pay and all Federal pensions over the same 3-year period.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado just asked me a question to explain basically the difference between the proposal that I offer here today and the more highly publicized KGB plan that our distinguished colleagues from Kansas, Iowa, and Delaware will be offering. This plan is a 3-year freeze instead of 1 year, and this will have the rose garden defense numbers in it, but in addition to the rose garden defense numbers, it would reflect about significant savings in addition to that because there will be no DOD—civilian and military—pay raises from fiscal year 1985 through 1987, and also in military pensions, there will be no COLA's from 1985 through 1987.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SYMMS. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The Senator from Idaho is well aware that this year you cannot offer a budget plan with any hope of success unless it has some sort of an important acronym. In other words, this is in the down payment plan or Rose Garden plan or KGB plan. What is the name that attaches to this by which we should know this?

Mr. SYMMS. This is the Symms budget proposal for 1984, which I think would give us economic recovery.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I must say I am attracted, sort of, to the substance of this idea, but I just think that in 1984 you have to have a flashier name than that in order to attract the attention of Members and the general public, and I urge the Senator to think on that.

While he does, may I ask a couple of questions about the substance of it?

Mr. SYMMS. The Senator certainly may.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wish to be sure I understand.

What the Senator is doing in this budget proposal is to cut the nondefense discretionary programs 10 percent from the CBO baseline.

Mr. SYMMS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Then with respect to the entitlement programs to the cost-of-living adjusted programs, the Senator is freezing the cost-of-living adjustments except for those which are means-tested?

Mr. SYMMS. Anyone that is means-tested would not have their benefits frozen. They would get their cost-of-living adjustments.

I might also say that the people in this plan who would, say, be social security recipients, if for any reason they came under the poverty level, then they would be qualified to apply for means-tested entitlements, and therefore eligible to pick up again a full COLA. So this plan keeps the safety net in place for the people that need to participate in means-tested entitlement programs.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, he offered a version of this plan in committee. I voted against it because, as I understood it at that time, it did not incorporate substantial savings in the defense function.

It appeared to me, as much as I would like to maintain the strongest and most powerful defense that we can afford, it did appear to me that large-scale cuts in other programs would not be feasible if we are unwilling to make some savings in defense. So I reluctantly voted against his plan.

But do I understand correctly that the Senator is now suggesting, in addition to what we have already discussed, that he is also planning cutbacks in the rate of increase in growth in the defense function, as well?

Mr. SYMMS. That is correct. I have taken the Republican leadership package, known as the rose garden package, and added more savings than that package has with respect to defense by freezing DOD pay and military COLA's. The package I offered in the committee that the Senator refers to included a $27 billion defense savings over fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987. It reflected only $27 billion in savings in the area of defense.

We are having CBO recalculate those numbers, so I believe we will be somewhere closer to $40 billion in defense savings and $132 billion in nondefense savings. The total, instead of around $181 billion, is going to be closer to around $200 billion.

The Senator asked me another question moments ago when we were casually visiting, about the tax side of this package. I did not include the $50 billion package that has passed the Senate since this was estimated. So, in effect, if that package all become part of the law and my budget plan becomes part of the law, there would be over a $250 billion savings on the deficit as opposed to the $200 billion that will be reflected here.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The $250 billion, that is from the CBO baseline or from the baseline adjusted in the same way that the committee's proposal is? In other words, should we compare that with the $150 billion number that is proposed by the pending leadership or rose garden amendment?

Mr. SYMMS. I am not sure I can answer that question. I need to counsel with the staff on that.

The reason I had the higher defense number to begin with was because this plan was calculated using the President's original request.

I would say to the Senator that the savings would be about $200 billion from the baseline.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. From the CBO baseline?

Mr. SYMMS. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. And that is the amount of the savings in the Senator's amendment?

Mr. SYMMS. That is the savings in Government spending.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. And an additional $48 to $50 billion is included in the tax portion of the bill that has already gone through the Senate?

Mr. SYMMS. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. For purposes of comparison, the net deficit reduction we would expect under this plan would be about $250 billion?

Mr. SYMMS. That is correct.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It is not quite double, but it is substantially greater than other proposals now pending?

Mr. SYMMS. Yes. And I would say to the Senator that if something like this should pass the U.S. Senate today, I think the response in the financial markets would be absolutely, overwhelmingly positive. I think our colleagues would be heartened if we could, in fact, muster up enough votes to pass this. I think what it would say to the world is that Congress is finally beginning to recognize that the only way they are going to resolve our economic problems is not by cutting everybody's paycheck, or something equally drastic, but by saying firmly that we are not going to increase anybody's benefits until we get out of this economic crisis.

I think the Senator from Colorado is well aware of the fact, as I am, that we are in a crisis situation. Yet, somehow there seems to be no willingness in this body or in the other body to really take a tough stance necessary to get out of this spending spiral.

I do not say that this is an easy vote for anybody to cast, but I do believe it is the right approach to our budget crisis. As I said earlier, we are spending 25 percent of the gross national product, while revenues amount to about 19 percent of the gross national product. The budget is "balanced" by borrowing, of which, I might say, Mr. President, a great portion of the deficit is carried by investment from overseas. So we have become a debtor nation in the proceess of this continuous deficit spending.

I think it creates a highly volatile and dangerous situation for the American citizenry to be in, with instantaneous bank withdrawals where computers can transfer billions of dollars across the ocean in a matter of seconds. The circumstances are certainly present which could in fact allow for a situation to arise where people would decide that it was time to take their money out of U.S. Treasury bills and take it back over to Europe or Japan, or wherever. If that happened, I think we would find that the situation could be an absolute calamity with respect to the financial markets and interest rates could very well increase sharply.

I do not know when this is going to happen, whether it is going to happen in 1984, whether it will happen in 1985, or in 1986. It always astounds me, as a fervent believer in capitalism and free enterprise, how the system in the United States has survived as long as it has when it is so badly abused by the Government policies of overtaxation, of excessively taxing the industrial base of the country, excessively taxing capital, excessively taxing work, and destroying individual work incentive. It amazes me that we manage as well as we do.

I have often made the comment to some of my friends that I am sometimes glad that in general the public and the people of the country do not realize just how bad the situation is or it might create a panic if the public recognized the future impact of the failure of the Congress to come to grips with this excessive spending.

Mr. CHILES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMMS. I am happy to yield to my friend from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. I was listening to my good friend explain his defense savings to the Senator from Colorado. I just need a little more edification.

Those defense savings of $40 billion sound a little like the savings my wife tells me she has made when she comes back from a sale. The fact that she only bought one hat and two dresses rather than buying four is supposed to be a "savings." And the other saving, of course, is that the dresses and hat were on sale. But maybe the store took a $100 dress and marked it up to $200 and then sold it "on sale" for $100.

I have a hard time understanding what is meant by $40 billion in defense savings. Maybe the Senator from Colorado can explain that, because he seems to be enamored with the plan that contains these defense "savings."

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I think the Senator from Florida is correct that we are talking about savings from the rate of projected increase, whether it is CBO or the President. And he is absolutely correct in describing these as the kind of savings that might occur if someone decided to only buy one new hat instead of four.

But that is the sort of savings we are talking about all across the board in this budget. As far as I know, we are not talking about net year-to-year reductions in anybody's plan. In the private sector and among working men and women, when they talk about making a cut, they are talking about spending less next year than this year. Let me cite one quite specific example that is near to my heart.

In Pueblo, Colo., there is a great company which has been the backbone of that community. And the working men and women of that company, through their labor organization, agreed to a cut in their compensation giving back wage and fringe benefits that they had spent decades earning. When they said they were taking a cut, they did not mean trim off something of next year's increase. They meant rolling back the rate of pay. That is what a cut means in common parlance. But all through this budget, we are not talking about that anywhere and maybe we should be.

Mr. CHILES. We want to give credit to the Senator from Idaho because I think he is talking about a real cut from the baseline in the domestic programs. That will be a real cut from last year.

Mr. SYMMS. That is correct.

Mr. CHILES. It will be a real cut for the Coast Guard. It will be a real cut for the Department of Justice. It will be a real cut for the FBI. It will be a real cut for the Drug Enforcement Administration. It will mean a real cut for them. But I say to my friend from Colorado, when we get to defense, it is not a real cut at all. The CBO says defense will go up $7.2 billion under the plan of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. I say to my friend from Florida that there is an answer to that. Mr. President, while I still have the floor, I will send the amendment to the desk. I want to answer the question, before the clerk reports, to my colleague from Florida. The President initially asked for a much higher defense number. Originally in the committee I had this budget calculated on the President's $305 billion request for defense. I have since reduced that figure to the level agreed upon in the rose garden budget, as I understand it, which is a 7-percent growth in defense. But I say to my colleague that it is not only President Reagan that recognizes that we had to have an increase in our defense spending. On March 15, under congressional pressure, the President agreed to $22 billion in further defense cuts. But if you go back and look at what President Carter was saying in his last year in office, the Reagan program right now is below the levels of defense spending which President Carter felt were required, but which were rejected by the American people in the 1980 elections as being inadequate.

I think the constitutional and the historical mandate of this body—as the National Congress—is that there is a constitutional responsibility to provide adequately for the Nation's defenses.

I say to my colleague that, if there are some issues with respect to drug enforcement, with respect to the Coast Guard, I believe this Congress can address those issues individually, and make some tradeoffs in some of those very vital and critical areas. I have no argument with that. However, if you recall the Grace Commission report, which has largely been set aside thus far by Congress, it made the recommendation that, if we would reward those people in positions of authority in the senior executive management corps of the civil service, they could in fact reduce expenditures in their area by at least 12 to 15 percent with no diminution of the services which they are providing to the public. Peter Grace said the incentive system is totally in the opposite direction from the way it is in the business sector.

What he suggests is that we pay those people a bonus so they are rewarded for saving money. I am suggesting that with this amendment—some of the unnecessary bureaucracy and unnecessary paperwork could be reduced, without reducing the effectiveness of those particular agencies.

AMENDMENT NO. 3031

(Purpose: To restrain federal spending)

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Idaho (Mr. SYMMS) proposes an amendment numbered 3031 to amendment No. 3027.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted, insert the following: "Act."

SEC. . (a) It shall not be in order to consider any measure making appropriations in the Senate or House of Representatives, if the enactment of such bill or resolution, as recommended by the respective committees on appropriations, would cause the aggregate total budget authority for function 050, National Defense, to exceed $296,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985, $324,700,000,000 in fiscal year 1986, or $357,200,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(b) For all non-defense, discretionary programs, budget authority (or program levels, where appropriate) shall be reduced to a level which is 10% below the Congressional Budget office baseline level, as estimated in January 1984, in fiscal year 1985. For fiscal years 1986 and 1987, such budget authority or program levels shall be those determined above for fiscal year 1985.

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, there shall be no pay raises for civilian employees or for military employees of the Department of Defense in fiscal years 1985, 1986, or 1987.

(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, there shall be no cost of living adjustments in federal benefit programs—This subsection shall not apply to means-tested-entitlements.

(e) On October 1, 1984, every senior executive staff employee shall receive a one-time bonus in the amount of $20,000.00, Provided, That the spending reductions directed by this section have been achieved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There appears to be a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I would be happy to yield to my friend from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. I thank my distinguished friend. He got into an argument on the merits. I really was not trying to encroach on the merits. I am trying to understand the technical parts of the amendment, or how there is a $40 billion savings. The Congressional Budget Office says that defense will increase by $7.2 billion, and yet I hear claims about a $40 billion savings. I heard the distinguished Senator say that President Carter had asked for more.

The way I read the Constitution, it is not what the President asks for that determines what we spend. It is the responsibility of the Congress to tax, appropriate, and spend money. If it is our constitutional responsibility and if we carried out that responsibility last year, then it seems to me what we do this year should be measured against what we did last year, and not by a President's wish list.

When I look at that, I see that the Senator in his "savings" amendment is adding $7.2 billion to the rate of growth for defense, yet would turn around and cut all of the other programs. I have a hard time seeing where that is fair, and how that meets any criteria for claiming genuine savings.

Last year, I would say to the distinguished Senator, we actually ended up appropriating about 3.5 percent real growth for defense. Your amendment would double that rate of growth.

Mr. SYMMS. That is not correct. What this would do is take the Rose Garden number on defense which was substantially reduced from the President's original request.

Mr. CHILES. The Rose Garden number is just a fragrance. It is an essence. It has a smell. I do not want to go any further than that.

Mr. SYMMS. Let me put it this way. How much money is in this particular plan that is before us in the so-called Domenici amendment? How many billions of dollars are in that for defense spending? $297 billion for next year. Is that correct? Nearly $300 billion for 1985.

Mr. CHILES. $299 billion.

Mr. SYMMS. Then what you do is take that number and compute in my savings to get my lowered number—the fact that there will be no military or civilian pay increases in the Department of Defense over the 3-year period—which would be a reduction, according to my original plan, of $27 billion total. That is the answer, if I understand the Senator's question correctly. That is how we arrived at that number.

I say again to the Senator that there is an ongoing bipartisan understanding and agreement across this broad land of ours that we have to modernize our defense capabilities, both our strategic and tactical capability. It is difficult to get that done, but it is underway. That is how I arrived at that number.

Mr. CHILES. I still do not quite understand. There is $3 billion in the budget for the pay raise in 1985. Even if you multiply that by 3, I still do not get 27.

Mr. SYMMS. In 1985 we end up with $3 billion. In 1986 it would be $9 billion. In 1987 it would be $15 billion, for a total of $27 billion. The pensions account is also on defense. So what we are doing is not having COLA's for 1985, 1986, and 1987, except for those programs which are means tested.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Idaho will answer a question.

I have been handed a copy of this amendment. Let me read two subsections.

Subsection (c). Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, there shall be no pay raises for civilian employees or for military employees of the Department of Defense in fiscal year 1985, 1986, or 1987.

Then we come down to section (d).

Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, there shall be no cost-of-living adjustments in Federal benefit programs.

The next section says, "This subsection shall not apply to the means-tested entitlements."

The key section I wanted to ask about is subsection (e).

On October 1, 1984, every senior executive staff employee shall receive a one-time bonus in the amount of $20,000, provided, that the spending reductions directed by this section have been achieved.

Are we establishing some kind of a precedent there? What is this section?

Mr. SYMMS. What I would say to the Senator is that this came from the 1978 Civil Service Reform Act which passed the Congress and was signed into law by President Carter. There is a section in that act which allows for incentive bonuses. One of the suggestions from the Grace Commission report was that one of the failures of Government to be able to control its appetite for more and more spending is the fact that there is no economic incentive to achieve cost-savings for those people actually running the senior executive service. These are the people who make the decisions. They are the operation officers of the different agencies, the professional operations officers who are not political appointees. I am talking about people who are professional, senior executive service. There is no incentive for them to reduce expenditures.

The Grace report, in fact, found, over the years, that the bigger the program the more need for a higher civil service rating.

When Mr. Grace testified before the Budget Committee and the other committees of the Senate that I serve on, he made the statement that he believes, that if we allow the political appointees to decide which Federal employees should be paid those $20,000 bonuses to actually go out and save the taxpayers' money, it would be money well spent. There are 7,200 people in this category. What this budget does is to allow for up to $20,000 per year for each one of those. It does not mandate that they all get the $20,000.

I placed that provision in there to make that assumption that the money would be available to give these bonuses.

Mr. PRYOR. May I ask the Senator, what would be the definition of "senior executive staff employee?" Who would fall within that category or that definition?

Mr. SYMMS. It is my understanding that there are 7,200 of them. I might have to do a little research to find a precise definition. When a Grace Commission spokesperson testified, I remember distinctly that he made the statement there were 7,200 of them. The Grace Commission recommended that that number be reduced to 5,200. But, I am not trying to enact that suggestion here.

My point is that no matter who the President is, there should be some way so that the employees who save the taxpayers' money in those agencies without diluting the services that are supposedly being provided by that agency, or the regulatory or other activities, whatever the agency is. If they are doing that in a proper fashion and reducing the waste that takes place by implementing good management practices and good management techniques, there should be a way to reward them. That is what President Carter wanted to do. I think most Senators would like to see that done.

We all know that in the private sector if an employee reduces costs and increases profits, that is how he or she gets promoted. In the Government sector, the incentive is to get bigger numbers of people on the program and then you have to have more people working for you and more responsibility, and you get promoted. I am trying to get a better incentive system in place here.

Mr. PRYOR. I see what the Senator is trying to do. It is somewhat troublesome to me to recognize some factors. One factor is that subsection (e) proposal says "shall receive a one-time bonus." It is not "may be eligible to receive," but it says these senior executive staff employees "shall" receive a one-time bonus.

I will say what concerns me about this. I do not know who is going to be handing out these bonuses. I do not know if the Senator from Idaho does. I believe we have seen some real abuses in our bonus system within the governmental structure in the last 4 or 5 years. I think there is a very small, select group of people which makes decisions on who gets these bonuses.

Mr. SYMMS. I would be willing to modify that to change it to "may."

Mr. PRYOR. I do not have any objection——

Mr. SYMMS. I would ask that the amendment be changed to "may" in that subsection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered. The amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted, insert the following: "Act."

SEC. . (a) It shall not be in order to consider any measure making appropriations in the Senate or House of Representatives, if the enactment of such bill or resolution, as recommended by the respective committee on appropriations, would cause the aggregate total budget authority for function 050, National Defense, to exceed $296,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985, $324,700,000,000 in fiscal year 1986, or $357,200,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(b) For all non-defense, discretionary programs, budget authority (or program levels, where appropriate) shall be reduced to a level which is 10 percent below the Congressional Budget Office baseline level, as estimated in January 1984, in fiscal year 1985. For fiscal years 1986 and 1987, such budget authority or program levels shall be those determined above for fiscal year 1985.

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, there shall be no pay raises for civilian employees or for military employees of the Department of Defense in fiscal year 1985, 1986, or 1987.

(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, there shall be no cost of living adjustments in federal benefit programs. This subsection shall not apply to means-tested entitlements.

(e) On October 1, 1984, every senior executive staff employee may receive a one-time bonus in the amount of $20,000.00, Provided, that the spending reductions directed by this section have been achieved.

Mr. PRYOR. I will object to the whole section whether it is "may" or "shall." What we are looking at here is sort of a bonus for the buddy system. That is how I would classify this proposal.

Mr. SYMMS. The problem is the way we are failing to address the continued growth of Federal spending. I recall that the Senator and I were in the House recently together. He became Governor of his State, and then came back to the Senate. If he will think back to what the budget was when he was in the House originally and what it is today, he will acknowledge we are not addressing our spending problem today. It is not a partisan issue. It is not solely an issue of either the Democrats or Republicans. The system is growing faster and we are not controlling it. What I am saying is I think when President Carter came into town he had a very good idea of trying to put more flexibility into the Civil Service Act so that people could be dismissed if they were inefficient or had poor work habits, or had allowed wasteful practices to occur.

Also, he wanted to be able to reward them as in the private sector, because he recognized that those incentives worked in private enterprise. That is what we are trying to accomplish.

It may not be a perfect way. There may be bugs in it. I will not say this will work miracles, but at least it is better than what we are doing now. I think it is totally irresponsible for us to continue on this way without making some attempt to try to cut out some of the expensive growth and waste that we all know takes place in any Government agency, whether it be the Pentagon, HHS, or the Department of Agriculture. The nature of the system is that it breeds inefficiencies and incompetence, and encourages bigger and more spending programs. There is no incentive for anybody to reverse this dangerous trend.

Mr. PRYOR. I think this: what we are really faced with, and will be dealing with this day and in the course of next week, is to truly come forward with an equitable plan, such as a freeze on expenditures. I will support one of those freezes, though I do not know which one. I will vote for it on final passage. I will support one of those freezes just as I supported a freeze last May, which only 16 of our colleagues joined in, offered by Senator HOLLINGS. But that is history. Now we have to deal with the present and what we are about to do.

My real concern is that there will be no cost of living adjustments in Federal benefit programs, under subsection (d).

I wonder how we might react if we were a social security recipient drawing a very nominal sum of support each month who looks up and sees some 14,000 bureaucrats—I hate to call them that—"senior executive staff employees" receiving a bonus of up to $20,000. I think that is what is wrong with our approach in this type of amendment. That approach is simply not fair. It favors one group more than it favors another. In fact, it favors one group to the detriment of others. The cost-of-living increases, or whatever, are going to be spun off from more deserving groups and given to certain bureaucrats, most of whom, I assume, live in Washington, D.C.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, if I may answer that, that would be like comparing apples and oranges. When we talk about the possibility of maybe 7,000 people who could get a bonus of up to $20,000, we are then talking about a completely different thing. Millions and millions of Americans receive automatic cost-of-living adjustments. I find that when I visit with senior citizens, and ask them this question: If the choice is that you not get any cuts in your present benefits but not get any increases either, but we would have the opportunity for Federal spending reduction and a continued reduced rate of inflation which we have now in process—the senior citizens always answer affirmatively, that they would be willing to give up those increases in exchange for having a stable fiscal policy. They know this would mean lower interest rates so their children and grandchildren would afford to buy homes, and also would mean less inflation so they would not have their purchasing power destroyed.

Under my plan, anybody who falls into the poverty level would then qualify for means-tested programs, which are exempted from the cost-of-living adjustment freeze. I am trying to take care of those people who are less privileged in our society.

Mr. PRYOR. How would this affect a disability recipient? Would this cause the administration to continue cutting more from the disability rolls in the disability insurance program? Would this cause more cuts there?

Mr. SYMMS. As we know, Secretary Heckler has recently put a moratorium on that, I think properly so.

Mr. PRYOR. The moratorium is only in place until Congress acts on the issue. But here we are saying, "OK, go out and cut 10 percent more off the disability rolls," and then rewarding the people at the top with a $20,000 bonus for ordering those painful cuts.

Mr. SYMMS. No, Mr. President; that is not the way it is going to work. People who qualify for disability benefits would come under programs that would not be cut 10 percent. These would be programs that are means-tested entitlement programs, that are not cut 10 percent.

The only programs which are cut, which would be cut by 10 percent, would be the nondefense discretionary programs. Anyone who is receiving a Government benefit, say from a disability, would not be affected by this except that there may not be an increase for them if they are in a non-means-tested program.

If it were a social security disability benefit, they might not get an increase unless they fell under the poverty line. Let us say the first year went by, for example, and we had a cost-of-living increase of what is predicted now, 3.5 percent or something for this year and next year. Because of that, if someone fell from above the poverty line to below it, even if they are on a Government pension—a veterans pension, civil service pension, military pension or social security pension—if they in fact fell below the poverty line, they would be eligible to be picked up though the exempted means-tested programs. I am retaining the safety net so that the less advantaged people in our society would be protected. That is the total purpose of the author in writing this amendment.

Mr. PRYOR. One final point, Mr. President. I appreciate the Senator's explaining his position on this matter. My question is this: Should the Senator's amendment pass and be part of H.R. 2163, would not the language and the numbers in the Senator's amendment eventually have to be decided upon by the Senate and House Appropriations Committees?

Mr. SYMMS. That is correct.

Mr. PRYOR. So if we go through the appropriations process and if these levels are approved and if we decide on these levels in the Senator's amendment, it seems we are giving a bonus to civilian employees out there for doing exactly what the Appropriations Committee said to do anyway. So I do not see the Senator's logic in proposing this amendment, or that we can justify a reward or bonus for these employees.

Mr. SYMMS. I think the justification for it is that we are talking about having a few thousand dollars available for an incentive system to create a better managed Federal department or agency by rewarding someone who can run the shop better, and deliver the services more cost-effectively to the public. So I think there is a justification for this provision.

The way we have been operating, I have to say to the Senator, every year the Federal budget gets a little bit bigger. We go back home and find that, instead of raising havoc about a $10 billion deficit, it got to be a $20 billion deficit, then a $30 billion deficit, then a $200 billion deficit—it seems there is no end to it. I would be willing to take a chance to try to give this proposal an opportunity to work.

A certain number of people in each agency are appointed by the President. Those are the political appointees. They would hopefully have to exercise some commonsense and judgment, and make some decisions that it is very possible for them to make here with proper economic incentives.

The Senator is correct, and I think he brings up a very, very important point—that if we just slice off 10 percent of the money, if the agency saved the money but reduced the services to the public, then I would say that the political appointee or the Cabinet officer would decide they do not deserve the bonus. They would have to achieve savings in such a fashion that waste, inefficiencies, and so forth are eliminated.

Mr. PRYOR. Would the Senator's amendment apply to the legislative branch of the Government?

Mr. SYMMS. It would apply to all senior executive staff.

Mr. PRYOR. Would it apply to my office, for example, my Senate office?

Mr. SYMMS. No.

Mr. PRYOR. Would my worthy, very worthy, trustworthy administrative assistant, Mr. Don Harrell, receive a $20,000 bonus if he cut expenses in my office by 10 percent?

Mr. SYMMS. The answer to that question is that our offices do not enjoy the same protections that people do in civil service. A Senator can walk in and fire everybody on his staff if he chooses to do so and start over and hire new staff the next day. So I think we have that kind of protection.

Mr. PRYOR. Is this freeze and this bonus going to apply to the legislative branch? Frankly, I think they should. They ought to apply to all of us.

Mr. SYMMS. I think it should, too. It would apply to the legislative branch in terms of the amount of money that each office would get. I do not know if there are any senior executive service personnel serving in the legislative branch of Government. The bonuses would have to result from the specified 10-percent savings in the nondefense discretionary programs as the bill stipulates.

Mr. PRYOR. I do not know if a legislative branch assistant would receive this bonus or not.

Mr. SYMMS. By definition, those people are in the executive branch and in agencies like the Patent Office, Commerce Department, other areas like that.

Just as an example, I say to my colleague, if each senior executive service person got the $20,000 bonus, which I do not anticipate they would, at a maximum, it would cost $140 million. But if they achieve the savings we are asking them to achieve, we would be spending $140 million in order to save $132 billion. So it would pay for itself many, many times over. I think that is really the issue we are discussing.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I shall close by saying that I think every sincere, dedicated, senior executive service staff employee, whatever the definition is, ought to be doing this anyway. Why we are going to reward them $20,000 each for doing their job as they should be under normal, reasonable circumstances, is somewhat baffling.

I do yield the floor, Mr. President, and I appreciate the Senator's answering my questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I think we are going to have a vote fairly soon, and while we are at ease for a moment I should like to explain how I am going to vote and why. I am going to support this amendment. There are some aspects of the proposal advanced by the Senator from Idaho which trouble me. Frankly, I am disposed to largely agree with what my colleague from Arkansas has said about the $20,000 bonus; there is some logic to that idea, but on balance I think perhaps it is not appropriate in this particular amendment. But the broad thrust and cut of this amendment is a good one, and so while I do have some reservations about that—in fact, I have another reservation or two about the amendment—the real issue is not the detail but the broad implication of it.

The particular aspect of the bonus issue, whether you think it is a good idea, as the Senator from Idaho has explained, and Peter Grace of the Grace Commission has pointed out, and a good argument can be made for it, or whether you have doubts about it, as I do, that is a very minor part of the overall amendment. The main issue is whether or not we are going to find some way to make some savings in this budget and get it balanced. The amendment of the Senator from Idaho goes a long ways in that direction and much further, may I say, than the pending amendment to which Senator SYMMS' proposal is itself an amendment. So I am going to vote for this amendment. If it does not pass, I am going to vote for a freeze, and if that does not pass, I am going to vote for something else because, without being repetitious, I have reached the point where I think we have to do something. I am ready to take some things that I would not otherwise be agreeable to just in the interest of somehow getting these deficits under control.

Mr. President, unless there are others who seek recognition, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I now have the revised numbers on my amendment, and I thank the staff for their very rapid work on this.

What the total deficit reduction now amounts to is about $230 billion in savings. I was talking more in terms earlier of $200 billion, but the level is closer to $230 billion in savings. I will explain what there would be if this is adopted to the Baker substitute, which has revenue increases of $48 billion in it. It would actually reflect over a 4-year period savings of $70.5 billion in defense spending, $132.7 billion in nondefense spending, for a subtotal change of $251.5 billion, a savings of $34.4 billion in interest, for a total change in the budget of $285.9 billion.

So the deficit in 1984 would be $186 billion, in 1985 it would be $160.7 billion, in 1986 it would be $138.9 billion, and in 1987 it would be $131.6 billion.

It still does not go far enough, Mr. President, in what we should be accomplishing here, and I agree I have had many of my colleagues come by and say why do you not change this or why do you not change that.

I am open to suggestions, and the plan would be open for amendment if Senators believe there are areas where maybe there is too much reduction. These questions have been raised with regard to military pay and in other areas. Senators could offer amendments. If this plan were substituted for the Baker substitute, amendments and other changes could be offered.

But I just wish to say again for those who may have missed the debate that we assume the revenue increases contained in the deficit reduction package as reported to the Senate, assume the Republican leadership defense requests for fiscal year 1985 through 1987, except we would allow no DOD military or civilian employee pay raises in fiscal year 1985 through 1987. On nondefense spending savings with respect to COLA's, there would be no COLA's in 1985 through 1987 except for means-tested programs which are exempted from the freeze. Also, we would assume military and civilian retirement COLA's in fact, all COLA's, would resume and could be moved to January 1, 1988. Discretionary programs would be as follows: This plan would cut budget authority, or the program level where relevant, 10 percent below the 1984 CBO baseline level and then freeze at that level in 1986 and 1987.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD this entire portion so that it will be clear what we are trying to accomplish.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

So Mr. SYMMS' amendment (No. 3031), as modified, was rejected.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT REQUEST

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if I could be so bold as to do so, I should like now to see if we can get a unanimous-consent agreement, not concerning passage, which I had hoped we might be able to do today, or even to limit time on amendments, which I also would like to do, but just to see if we can limit amendments. Both sides now have complied lists of amendments. I do not know whether we are in a position to do this or not, but what I propose to do is propound a unanimous-consent request that only the amendments which I am about to list will be in order to this bill or amendments to this bill. What that would mean is just what it says: no other amendment could be in order.

It would also mean that there is no time limitation on these amendments. They could go on and on. We might have to get cloture on them and we might not. But we do not know enough about the amendments now in good conscience to try to limit the time. Mr. President, I am afraid if we do not try to structure this debate by at least outlining the issues and the amendments to deal with them, we shall never finish. We shall, obviously, but this would help.

The list I am about to propound may not be complete. If it is not, I shall be perfectly happy to add to it. I guess the chances of this request being granted are pretty slim, but let me put it.

I ask unanimous consent that only the following amendments to this bill will be in order:

A Mattingly amendment dealing with line-item veto; a Mattingly amendment dealing with consultants fees; a D'Amato amendment dealing with Montauk Point location; a Grass-

ley amendment; a Boschwitz sense-of-the-Senate amendment on formula approach to reducing budget deficits; a Weicker amendment, $750 million for biomedical research; a Mathias amendment to study the aspects of the tobacco program; a Heinz amendment dealing with terrorists; a Heinz amendment dealing with aging;

A Stafford amendment to exempt EPA's budget from the appropriations cap; a Packwood amendment to exempt certain aviation programs financed with trust fund receipts from appropriations cap; an Armstrong amendment waiver for appropriations caps; a Gorton amendment, caps on indexing entitlements of COLA's; a Wilson amendment saying if Federal Government passes law with financial impact on State and local governments, the Federal Government will reimburse them; a Kasten amendment dealing with the Grace Commission; a Hawkins amendment on dairy; a D'Amato-Specter amendment for an additional $200 million on budget outlay for prison construction; a D'Amato amendment on transit; three Chafee amendment dealing with appropriations caps;

Two Dole technical amendments; a Nickles amendment to reduce the COLA's and modify the discretionary and adjust the indexing on taxes included in the leadership amendment; a Helms 5-percent across-the-board cut; a Mitchell amendment on pay for Federal judges; three Kennedy amendments, one on medicare-medicaid, one on budget caps, and one not yet specified as to subject matter; three Bradley amendments on education, EPA funding increase, and an overall substitute; three Metzenbaum amendments, one on Job Corps, one on defense spending level, and one unspecified;

A Hollings-Exon amendment on freeze; a Chiles amendment on budget alternative; two Moynihan amendments, one land transport, one unspecified; three Baucus amendments, one Medicare, one bipartisan budget freeze, and one not specified; a Bumpers amendment on medicaid; a DeConcini waste, fraud, and abuse amendment making savings in fiscal year 1985 in areas such as travel consultants and motor vehicles; and a Levin amendment on leaseback transition rule tax exempt entities.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am not surprised, as I said earlier, I feared we might not get it, but I thought it would be worth the effort.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will yield at that point, let me say, as one Senator who is not on the Appropriations Committee or the Budget Committee, it is the hope of this Senator that we might have an opportunity to agree on an amendment that would be a more effective reduction in the level of spending than the Senate shows a disposition to vote at this point. I just do not like to see that potential closed off until we have a better feel of what the will of the Senate is.

We are hoping to get some idea as to how much economizing it might be good to vote for at this point. We just do not know. I do not feel like closing off my right or the right of other Senators to come up with something that might result in a more substantial reduction in Federal spending. At this moment, I do not see the votes for the Senate to agree upon, so this Senator is hoping that he might get to vote on an amendment that has a better prospect than he sees at the moment. He does not know what it might be. This is to protect the rights of all who might feel that way.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are 48 amendments on this list and 6 are unspecified as to subject matter. There is no time limitation on any of them. I even hesitated to put the request, because there are holes in it big enough to drive a Mack truck through. In any event, I thought it was worth the effort to see if we could identify what we are going to do. I do not think we can at the moment.

The Senate has a way of deciding when it is finished with a subject and moving on to a conclusion. I find that to try to get it to move before that is sort of like pushing a wet noodle, you just cannot make it go.

Mr. President, I will not repeat the request today. We will be in session tomorrow. I fully expect there will be votes tomorrow. We will continue on the matter next week as long as necessary, all week if necessary, and beyond if need be.

Mr. President, I will continue to try to compile a list that we might be able to translate into another unanimous-consent request but not until Monday.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. I think it might be helpful to the majority leader and to all of us if we can be sure that all Senators who are here and who are listening understand that they may offer amendments to the bill. They may offer amendments to the Baker amendment. I will refer to it as the Baker amendment; it is the leadership amendment on that side. And amendments to the amendment by Mr. BAKER would be amendments in the second degree. So I hope that Senators will determine whether or not they want to offer amendments to the Baker perfecting amendment to the committee substitute or whether they want to offer amendments to the bill, realizing that any amendments that are adopted to the bill will be wiped out by the adoption of the committee substitute, as amended, if amended. With that, I hope that I have been helpful.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. CHILES. I wonder if the distinguished majority leader will yield to me for a minute?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. CHILES. I sympathize with the effort the majority leader is trying to make to move the Senate forward. I am not sure the Senate is ready to move just now. From what we have heard today, it probably is not ready.

I also understand that the majority leader is putting something forward which has no time agreement on amendments and allows everybody to put their name on the list. It is very broad. My understanding was that he was talking about excluding any further amendments to the Baker amendment to the boat bill, or any other amendments.

I think some Senators would be concerned that there should be a possibility for some adjustments. If we are still going the reconciliation route, and the Baker amendment is adopted, and, as anticipated, the Parliamentarian rules we are in reconciliation, that then there should be some opportunity at that stage, under the rules of reconciliation, to attempt to amend. Or if we are going to have a unanimous-consent agreement with that provision, a few key amendments might be allowed to come up. I suggest that might assuage some of the fears out there that Senators do not want to get locked in right now.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Florida, who is the ranking member of the Budget Committee. His points are well taken. I am perfectly willing to discuss that with any Senator. I privately indicated—perhaps I have said it on the floor, but I will say it now on the floor—to the minority leader as far as I am concerned, if we can obtain the objectives, that is, to make sure that the budget result that we enact has the effect of law and is simply not an objective without going the reconciliation route and assuming we can work out other technicalities like how we meet the other body in conference and with whom we go to conference, if those things can be worked out, I am not stuck on the idea of going the reconciliation route.

I am perfectly willing to try to do it another way. Believe me—and I am sure the Senator does believe me—I am not trying to strong-arm the Senate and I am not trying to create a new precedent. We have gone the reconciliation route two or three times. The most recent one was the TEFRA bill I guess. But I am not stuck on that. We can do it simply by statutory language and without the use of reconciliation.

But in order to do that, if I am to give up that opportunity, which the Senate has used in the past, it seems to me there ought to be some sort of protection put in its place. That really is what I am after by trying to limit the number of amendments. I would prefer to have a limited number of amendments and have time limitations on those amendments and have a time certain for final passage. Then we would be protected, as we would be on reconciliation.

Mr. CHILES. I think the majority leader's statement falls on welcome ears on this side. I think we have had a great concern about not wanting to set a precedent. There has been some worry about viewing germaneness with a vote of 51. I think he is speaking to calm those fears. I hope, when the time comes, we can reach a unanimous-consent agreement. I think the majority leader believes we have a lot of amendments on the list that will never actually be called up. At this stage the chairman of the committee and I do not know how to get people to move toward some of the freeze packages because everybody wants to be last.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, may I say, if I can interrupt the Senator, I have had by count 10 Senators who have indicated to me they want to be last.

Mr. CHILES. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. Everybody cannot be last. One person can be last. I want to say I hereby claim the right to be last.

Now, I hope everybody else, after taking that into account, will get off that and come on and offer their amendments because they are not going to be last. They may be next to last, but they are not going to be last. If the minority leader wants, he can be next to last.

Mr. CHILES. I think we would like to claim that right.

Mr. BYRD. The majority leader might find the minority leader to be last.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the distinguished majority leader yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BAKER. If the Senator from Florida will yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may I say that the distinguished majority leader has indicated his willingness to attempt to work out a time agreement and I had hoped we could do that. I hope that we can yet do so at some point. But from what I have heard said today, I agree that this is not the time. I do want, if the majority leader will allow me, to emphasize, when we seek out the identity of Senators and amendments, that Senators really know that what we are talking about now is amendments, as of now, to the leadership amendment to the committee substitute to the bill.

Now, Senators might be thinking in terms of amendments to the bill, but they may as well forget that at this point. The amendment by the Republican leadership is an amendment in the first degree to the committee substitute and is open only to amendments in the second degree at this juncture. So there will not be any piggy-backing as of this moment as long as Mr. BAKER's amendment is pending as the first-degree amendment to the committee substitute.

Senators can get around that amendment by going to the bill, but it will likely be of no avail to them in the final analysis.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I think it is important Senators understand that. If they want to see a picture of the amendment situation, it is on page 70 of the book, "Senate Procedure."

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am going to yield the floor so the distinguished manager of the bill, the chairman of the Budget Committee, can seek recognition.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Before the majority leader does, will he yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes; I am happy to yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Does the majority leader understand the parliamentary procedure now to be such that further amendments in connection with the revenue portion of the bill would be in or out of order, and would amendments that do not affect the original Dole amendment but are separate and apart that would produce revenue be in order?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I better think about that just for a minute. Certain amendments, one by Senator KENNEDY and one by Senator BAUCUS, were made in order by unanimous consent.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I understand.

Mr. BAKER. The question, as I understand it, put by the Senator is other revenue amendments which do not directly affect that amendment which has already been acted on, the Dole amendment, but affect either the Baker amendment or the bill itself, would they be in order at this time? Let me think about it.

Mr. METZENBAUM. And I might add, while the majority leader is thinking about it, whether or not an amendment which would have some impact either directly or indirectly, upon the Dole amendment that has already been adopted would be out of order?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are some things I have to think about, other things I do not have to think about, and some things I should not think about, even if I could. We are getting carelessly close to the third category. In the final analysis, the Senate or the Chair and the Parliamentarian are going to decide those things.

Give me an opportunity to consult at least with the Parliamentarian, and I will talk to the Senator from Ohio further, in colloquy or privately.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I want to comment on the situation and put it into perspective versus 2 weeks ago.

The joint leadership met, and we talked about the process and procedures to get this matter completed as a major reconciliation bill. There were some very serious and legitimate concerns. They were not necessarily, as some depicted, precedent-setting; but, nonetheless, a major change in the approach did take place.

One of the suggestions and concerns came from the distinguished Senator from Florida with reference to a budget resolution; others were with reference to, "Do you need a reconciliation bill as part of this tax measure and expenditure savings bill?"

Basically, a number of changes in the approach were taken by the majority leader because of those concerns. We do not have before us anything that limits germaneness, or limits scope, other than the process itself normal to the Senate.

When our leader asks that we list the amendments, he is not asking for time, he is not asking for a time certain for action, but merely that we have some idea when we might complete this matter as it relates to a number of amendments.

It is complicated procedurally, but not so complicated in terms of what people want to do. One can look at this and see that it is a rather simple bill. We finished the tax portion, and now we have a portion of that bill with caps for defense and appropriated accounts. Also included are some entitlement savings that were adopted by the Finance Committee months ago. They are incorporated in the amendment, and that is really about it at this point.

We are having a great deal of difficulty because everybody thinks that the leadership package incorporated in the Baker amendment is not a significant deficit reduction package, and everyone wants to do better and wants to get more deficit reduction. The distinguished Senator from Louisiana has already mentioned this.

We have at least four packages that have been proposed which, if adopted, would reduce the deficits more. We do not have to talk about them by name. Everybody has known about them. Those who are concerned can look at them and see if they like them. If they do not, there are plenty of people around here with expertise to modify them. There is great modification possible with reference to defense and appropriated accounts. Do you like the tax bill, and do you want to add some new tax-raising measure standing on its own as part of an amendment?

The others are freestanding amendments that try to change the appropriated account numbers, and they are lump sum numbers for fiscal year 1985-87. Some would want to add money, and some would want to subtract money from the defense appropriations.

The leadership on this side, particularly Mr. BAKER, met with the chairmen and the distinguished minority leader on the other side and made significant changes. No one is trying to prevent amendments or to keep us from voting. All that has been changed. A number of us would just like an opportunity to call up some of those amendments and let the Senate vote.

The Senator from Florida is right: We have at least four packages, and everybody wants to be last. I am amenable to anyone who wants to be last. If there is an official position on the other side, I have no objection, I say right now, to that being the last package, if that is what is desired.

On the other hand, there are many other freestanding amendments that are being applied to this package in rather ingenious ways so as to express the sense of the Senate. Some are real, in terms of adding money to the appropriated accounts. Frankly, we stand ready on this side to take them up and get some votes. I hope we can get that done before too long.

Eventually, I hope we can agree on a limitation on amendments, so that we can make some headway in taking those we know about, in whatever order the sponsors wish.

Having said that, I do not know that anybody wants to call up an amendment.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do this at the suggestion of Mr. BAKER: There is a possibility that there will be an effort to call up H.R. 4170, which, as I understand it, is a tax bill from the other body, and at that point to put on that bill everything that has been worked out prior thereto. That is a bit of a new idea, I suppose I would call it. I heard it discussed only yesterday, as I think the majority leader also did.

So Senators should know that if that occurs at that point, without a time agreement, that measure would be open to amendments. So we have a number of vehicles to which amendments may be offered: the Federal boat safety bill; the Baker perfecting amendment to the committee substitute; at some point, amendments to the committee substitute; and at some point, if indeed an effort is made to call up this new bill, H.R. 4170, amendments could be offered to it.

So I hope that when we attempt to identify amendments and Senators find out what they want, they have in mind that there is more than one vehicle.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, earlier this month I introduced S. 2516 to require graduated budget deficit reductions. This bill would establish a maximum deficit for each year and put teeth into the budget process so that these targets would be met one way or another. My bill would reduce deficits about $249 billion over the next 3 years from the Congressional Budget Office's latest baseline projections.

Under my bill, Congress would be committed to adopting a budget which will limit the fiscal year 1985 budget deficit to about $166 billion. Further reductions would be required each year until 1994 when deficits would be eliminated.

During the first 2 years at least two-thirds of the reduction in the deficit, relative to baseline levels, must be in the form of spending reductions. Thereafter, spending reductions would be at least equal to revenue increases.

This legislation would not designate the extent to which mandated savings would be achieved in particular areas. That would be flexible and a subject for further discussions. But, if Congress fails to meet the deficit target, the President would propose rescissions of budget authority sufficient to comply with the target but could propose reducing no area more than 10 percent. Any additional proposal reductions would come across the board. Congress, through a fast-track reconciliation process, could modify the President's proposed rescissions in any way it chooses.

But, if necessary changes are not promptly enacted, the President would be authorized to implement his original proposals with respect to areas of discretionary spending. If further reductions proved necessary to meet the year's deficit reduction target, he would be required to institute additional across-the-board reductions in all areas of spending, except interest on the debt.

The distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee should be commended for his efforts and the very significant accomplishments he has achieved. A $144 billion deficit reduction is certainly significant. Similarly, it is a big step in the right direction to write into law statutory spending caps requiring a majority of Senators voting to go on record as big spenders before those caps may be violated.

Still, this is one Senator who would like still more meaningful action with respect to both the magnitude and the enforceability of deficit reductions. That is why I introduced S. 2516. I wish to inquire of the distinguished chairman who has done such a great job, along with his committee, the Budget Committee, if he would be willing to hold hearings on S. 2516 as a potential followup to the downpayment which we are now considering?

If I could ask the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee that question, I shall appreciate hearing his thoughts on that.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, let me first say that I thank the distinguished Senator from South Dakota.

S. 2516 is currently pending before the Budget Committee, but we have not yet scheduled hearings on it.

I think almost everyone in this Chamber now agrees that the Federal deficit is an important issue and must be dealt with forcefully and promptly. We are all taking significant steps in that direction and we are doing that here today. Further steps will have to be taken in the future, and I think that the Budget Committee should hold hearings on S. 2516, and I will be pleased to work with the Senator from South Dakota to arrange those hearings.

I must indicate, however, that I am not sure that amendments to the Budget Act are the ultimate answer or even the answer that we need at this point to our deficit problems.

While I commend the Senator for his efforts, I must say in all honesty that frankly I think we have tools that will alleviate the deficit. One of those is the act itself, but it is only as powerful as the congressional will to implement it. While it may be cumbersome in some respects, it really is only as far as a way and as effective as the collective will of the two bodies and would still be the case if we amended it and tried to make it even stronger.

Nevertheless, there is room for improvement. There is no doubt about that. And I am interested in looking at all these ideas which might improve the process with the ultimate goal of reducing the deficits and having a better and more responsive handle on fiscal policy.

It is gratifying to know that Senators like the Senator from South Dakota are putting their talents to work in this area out of a genuine concern.

I thank the Senator for the bill and for introducing it, and I also thank him for bringing it up to the floor in the manner that he has here.

Clearly he could force a vote on a total amendment to the budget here in a manner and consistent with the ideas expressed in S. 2516, but it must ultimately be heard by a committee because it is a new approach. It must come to the floor with a reasoning that can come out of the committee, and I thank the Senator for doing it that way and commit to him that we will try to arrange hearings as soon as possible.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I thank the chairman for those words. I certainly appreciate the background, knowledge, and expertise he has in this budget problem and the work he has done, along with the Senator from Florida and the whole committee on this very difficult problem.

I know everyone has his own ideas on what makes up a good budget and how to cut the deficit. But this is one proposal and the very fact that it mandates Congress if they pass this to do this I think has great potential, and I appreciate the fact that the chairman has given me the opportunity at a later date when it is a more convenient time to bring this up for a hearing.

I still think it does have merit, but I wish the Senator to know I do appreciate his thoughts and views on this, and I am looking forward to a later time when we can have a further discussion on it, and I thank him very, very much.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, unless somebody has an amendment they would like to bring up, and I see no one here, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Something sort of like this happens on every important bill; that is, at some point you suddenly realize nobody wants to offer an amendment. But I bet that if I were to ask the Chair to put the question on the amendment right now, it would not succeed. I see my friend, the minority leader, is smiling. I know I would do the same, and he would stop me from doing that as he should because it is his responsibility to protect Members on his side of the aisle. But something has to happen, it seems to me, Mr. President. I know the minority is trying to produce an amendment to be offered this afternoon. We are trying to do that on our side. But here we stand, the chairman, the ranking Member, the majority and minority leaders. And, as far as I can tell, we are the only ones here.

Mr. President, I have never done this, and I am not going to do it now. I have never called up somebody else's amendment. It is far too early to do that. But I do not rule out that possibility later.

But, Mr. President, may I make a more modest suggestion, if the chairman and ranking Member are willing to consider it; that is, informally I wonder if they would be willing to try to take a first cut at scheduling some amendments. We have no authority to do that. But at least it would be a point of departure, if we sat down and say, alternated between Republican and Democratic amendments; or, if there was an equal opportunity to make some appraisal from their expert point of view on how long it might take, or ought to take, to debate the amendments and try to fit that into a calendar that would dispose of the 48 amendments that are on the list.

As I say, they have no authority under the rules and the precedents of the Senate to do that. But the leadership, on this side at least, would be terribly pleased to have such a first effort. I bet that some Senators who are listening in their office would then at least have some interest when the chairman and ranking Member might be inclined to put their amendment on that list.

Mr. CHILES. Given the pace at which we are going, would he like to give us until Tuesday or Wednesday? Then keep the Senate in session while we go somewhere to see if we can arrange to come up with that kind of list. That is something that we can certainly sit down and attempt to do. The problem that I am going to find and I think the distinguished chairman of the committee is also going to find, is that we do not have the power to instruct people as to the order in which they are going to go. Probably the only thing that is going to start this thing moving is beginning some kind of debate and voting on the package of amendments.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I think that is right. It might have a very good effect, if the two managers of the bill would be agreeable to sitting down, trying to figure out a logical schedule, not the only logical schedule, but a logical schedule for proceeding.

Then, let us see if we can get Members to come to the floor, and offer their amendments. It is 3 o'clock in the afternoon, almost. Nothing is happening. At least, as I said earlier, that would be a modest effort to get the ball rolling. If the two managers are inclined to do that, I would be personally grateful.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. DOMENICI. I am pleased to try. We will get started on it now. The Senator from Florida and I will advise you as soon as we have something that we think is meaningful. We will start contacting some of the proponents to see if they are interested.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the majority leader is experiencing a very frustrating moment here. I know how frustrating that can be. He is entitled to at least having Senators on both sides of the aisle come forward now. I cannot see any reason why I or more Senators out of 48, 40, 38, or 28 who have the 48 amendments cannot come over and offer an amendment. But as the distinguished ranking Member said a moment ago, there is nothing we can do to force them to do that. We are attempting to get Senators, on our side to come over. We have three Senators in mind. I asked our aides a moment ago to check with the three Senators to see if one of them could come over and offer an amendment today. The majority leader is entitled to that consideration. Everyone has to be understanding of his responsibilities.

Mr. President, I know that the majority leader feels terribly frustrated at times, and has to. But I can remember the last time this Senator tried to call up the amendments of other Senators. That was in 1977, when I called up and disposed of about 30 amendments of other Senators in the course of about 10 minutes. The amendments were from my side of the aisle, and cloture had already been invoked. I expected to be censured, expelled, or lynched. I could not even get some of my own colleagues to agree to my request to speak for a few minutes.

As I recall, Senator SARBANES was kind enough to get recognition and yield to me. The late Senator Jim Allen, with whom I had had a few little skirmishes, came over and told me he was with me. I knew that with Jim Allen on my side, I would come out all right in the end.

At this moment, at least, I have confidence, probably from being born an optimist, that the majority leader will prevail at some point.

Mr. President, I would bet that the chairman of the Budget Committee has a Senator coming over now.

Mr. DOMENICI. We do have two from our side.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, for fear that I might use more time that could otherwise be used in calling up amendments, I am prepared to yield the floor and express my thanks to everyone.

First, I will say to the minority leader I remember that episode. I still have scars and bruises about my body from that because I was a willing participant with the then majority leader, now minority leader. I remember the shouting and screaming that went on. But I also remember we would never have gotten the bill passed if that had not happened.

Mr. BYRD. The majority leader is right.

Mr. BAKER. That experience was not lost on this majority leader, who was then minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I would say if I had to do it again tomorrow, I would do it again.

Mr. BAKER. I do not doubt it. Whatever the rules, I have learned from the present minority leader, and I believe I have learned a lot.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 3032

(Purpose: To provide for reductions in the amount that may be expended for various Government activities)

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment on behalf of myself and the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) for himself and Mr. MATTINGLY proposes an amendment numbered 3032.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in amendment numbered 3027, insert the following:

COST SAVINGS BY ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION

SEC. . (a) For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, the total amount which may be obligated for travel and transportation of persons and transportation of things for officers and employees of all departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Government shall be reduced by $750,000,000 below the total amount appropriated for such travel and transportation for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall allocate the reduction in such total amount required by the preceding sentence among the departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Government. In making such allocation, the Director shall not reduce any amounts to be obligated for debt collection, administration of loans, necessary and essential law enforcement activities, or emergency national defense activities of the Federal Government.

(b) For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, the total amount which may be obligated for consultant services by departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Government shall be reduced by $1,000,000,000 below the total amount appropriated for such services for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall allocate the reduction in such total amount required by the preceding sentence among the departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch.

(c) For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, the total amount which may be obligated for public affairs activities, public relations activities, public information activities, and advertising by departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Government shall be reduced by $100,000,000 below the total amount appropriated for such activities for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall allocate the reduction in such total amount required by the preceding sentence among the departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Government.

(d) For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, the total amount which may be obligated for publishing, printing, reproduction, and audiovisual activities by departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Government shall be reduced by $250,000,000 below the total amount appropriated for such activities for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall allocate the reduction in such total amount required by the preceding sentence among the departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Government.

(e) For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall effect savings of $2,100,000,000 through enhanced identification, recovery, and collection of Federal overpayments, delinquencies, and indebtedness which departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Government have most recently considered to be uncollectible. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall implement the preceding sentence in cooperation with the Comptroller General of the United States.

(f)(1) For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, in cooperation with the Administrator of General Services, shall reduce the total amount which may be obligated for operation, maintenance, management, leasing, acquisition, and disposal of non-tactical, non-law enforcement motor vehicles by departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the executive branch of the Government by $160,000,000 below the total amount appropriated for such activities for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, in cooperation with the Administrator of General Services, shall promulgate standards governing the identification, collection, and analysis of data which is necessary to implement the preceding sentence.

(2) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, in cooperation with the Administrator of General Services, shall conduct a comprehensive and detailed study of the feasibility of entering into contracts with qualified motor vehicle fleet management firms or other private firms and organizations to meet the requirements of the executive branch of the Government for the operation, maintenance, leasing, acquisition, and disposal of motor vehicles. Such study shall include an analysis of the costs that would be incurred, and the benefits that would be provided, as a result of such contracts. Within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall prepare and transmit a report containing the findings and conclusions of the study required by this paragraph to the appropriate committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives, including the Senate and House Committees on Appropriations.

(g) Within six months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall prepare and transmit to the Committees on Appropriations and the Budget of the Senate and House of Representatives a report describing the allocations and savings made in carrying out such subsections (a) through (f).

(h) In carrying out subsections (a) through (f), the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall adopt, whenever possible, the recommendations, management improvements, and cost control opportunities specified in the report of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, my amendment to the so-called Republican leadership amendment, offered by the Senator from Tennessee, is not complicated. It is not difficult to understand, nor does it cover innovative new measures to reduce Federal spending. In fact, this amendment is very similar to other amendments that I have offered to budget measures in the past.

Specifically, my amendment calls for locking in savings in a number of general Government administrative areas that have consistently been identified as ripe for cost-saving opportunities. Most recently the much-heralded Grace Commission report recommended management improvements and budget savings in virtually all of the areas addressed in this amendment. Let me briefly outline the cost savings in my amendment, cost savings that total $4,360,000,000 in fiscal year 1985.

First, my amendment calls for cutting $750 million in Federal travel and transportation activities below current fiscal year 1984 levels. The Grace Commission estimated that Federal travel and freight transportation alone totaled over $9.4 billion in 1982. According to OMB, the Federal travel and transportation budget for 1982 was actually $12.6 billion. Current estimates are that we spend about $12 billion a year on Federal travel. My amendment would embrace the cost saving measures in travel management proposed by the Grace Commission and make further savings in the nontactical nonlaw enforcement travel budget. My amendment would not affect emergency national defense travel, but normal Department of Defense administrative travel would be covered.

Second, this amendment calls for cutting consultant services spending by $1 billion below fiscal 1984 levels. Estimates of what the Federal Government spends on consultant services has varied, based on whose definition one might use. Several years ago, under former Appropriations Committee Chairman Warren Magnuson's leadership, a study was done that showed the Government spent at least $2.4 billion a year on consultants. An OMB estimate done at my request in March 1982 showed that the Government actually spent $3.7 billion a year on consultant services. A few years ago, the National Tax Limitation Committee suggested that $2 to $3 billion a year could be cut in consultant services without hurting the Government. My amendment calls for cutting the amount the Government spends on consultants by $1 billion in fiscal year 1985. I admit that this is a deep cut, but if we are really serious about cutting out the so-called "fat," consultant services is one of the best places to find that "fat."

Third, this amendment would cut the amount we spend on public affairs, public relations, public information and advertising by $100 million below 1984 levels. A 2-year comprehensive study by UPI investigative reporter Don Lambro a few years back revealed that the Government spends an astounding $1.5 billion a year in public relations activities. As we can see how well Government officials rate with the public, it has not paid off. According to a White House reorganization project in 1978, more than $24 million a year is spent on congressional relations or public affairs personnel alone. Other research has shown that the Defense Department has a press and public affairs staff of more than 1,500 people and the Department of Health and Human Services spends over $25 million a year on public affairs. By any yardstick, public affairs is big business in the Federal Government and should be sharply cut back. My amendment does just that.

It seems to me Government should stand more on its feet and on its reputation of what it produces than just on public relations.

Fourth, this amendment adopts the Grace Commission recommendations for cost savings in Government publishing, printing, reproduction, and audiovisual activities, with a savings of $250 million in fiscal year 1985. The Grace Commission estimated that over $1,463,000,000 could be saved over 3 years if their management proposals are adopted. I am somewhat less optimistic than the Grace Commission that we can achieve those kinds of savings over 3 years, especially in the first year, so I have modified the estimated savings and called for cutting $250 million in these activities in fiscal 1985. Hopefully, this will be a true downpayment on realizing the full savings estimates outlined by the Grace Commission in these areas of activity.

Fifth, my amendment calls for the Government to achieve savings of $2.1 billion through more aggressive, more efficient and more effective debt collection measures. The Debt Collection Act of 1982 that I was proud to cosponsor with Senator PERCY has laid the foundation for a more efficient national effort to go after the more than $43 billion in identified, delinquent debts that are owed Uncle Sam. The regulations to implement that act are now published. The Office of Management and Budget has announced its plans to crack down on the debt collection problem by using private credit rating bureaus. Even when you factor out unpaid Federal income taxes which would not be subject to the new Debt Collection Act provisions, nearly $18 billion in bad debts are on the books waiting to be collected. OMB in its "Major Themes and Additional Budget Details, 1985" book, published earlier this month, calls for an additional $2.1 billion to be collected in fiscal year 1985. My amendment merely locks in that goal and forces the executive branch to meet their own target.

Finally, this amendment adopts both the Grace Commission and my own recommendations with regard to reducing the cost and size of the Federal motor vehicle fleet. Specifically, my amendment calls for cutting the amount spent on the Federal fleet by $160 million—the same amount that the Congressional Budget Office estimates could be saved in fiscal 1985 if the Grace Commission proposals were adopted. The Government has a fleet of over 430,000 vehicles and a complicated hodgepodge of plans and programs for operating, maintaining, leasing, acquiring, and disposing these some vehicles. GSA handles the motor pool, individual agencies go off on their own and buy or lease cars at higher cost to the Government, and the private sector plays only a minor role in operating the fleet. My amendment forces the Government to cut back on both the size and cost of the fleet and also directs OMB to conduct a full-scale study of private sector alternatives to our present system of running the Federal motor vehicle fleet. Both the savings and the study are long overdue, I submit.

Mr. President, this is an amendment that will not hurt anyone in Government. It does not cut entitlements. It does not cut health care. It does not cut veterans benefits. It does force the Government to be more efficient. It does force agencies and OMB to adopt many of the Grace Commission proposals that appear to make good sense in cutting the cost of administering the Federal Government. And it does save over $4.3 billion in real money in fiscal year 1985. I know that many of my colleagues consider this type of amendment somewhat of a nuisance amendment, something that is more of an irritant than anything else. There is always a waste, fraud, and abuse amendment. But if we are going to vote on binding spending ceilings in the Senate and force all nondefense programs to share in the sacrifice, then the least we should do is cut the fat in administering Government activities before we hit the muscle.

I urge the adoption of the amendment and hope that the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee may see his way clear to accept this amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator two questions.

As I understand it, this so-called leadership amendment has a domestic appropriated accounts cap for the years 1985, 1986, and 1987. Whatever that cap is, it is the cumulative amount of budget authority for each of the respective years, a freeze, in fiscal year 1985, then a 5-percent increase in fiscal year 1986 and 1987.

As I understand the Senator from Arizona, he is not changing that. Am I correct?

Mr. DECONCINI. The Senator from New Mexico is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. Second, as I understand it, the Senator has amended that amendment to provide specific ways that the Senator prohibits appropriations from acting as they apply the total appropriation process to the total budget authority in these caps. Is that correct?

Mr. DECONCINI. Yes; the Senator from New Mexico is correct. The obligations we are amending and specifically directing where the savings shall be achieved.

Mr. DOMENICI. By saying they cannot spend——

Mr. DECONCINI. Obligations.

Mr. DOMENICI. They cannot obligate in the areas that you have spoken of.

Mr. DECONCINI. That is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator.

Now let me address the issue for the Senate.

Let me first compliment the Senator with respect to efforts to save money in some areas that certainly many of us consider to be among the less important of the Government. And if we had to prioritize, we surely would pick many of the areas that he is speaking of to direct savings cuts.

However, I want to say to the Senate that basically this is a very interesting process and procedure. You see, we are going to get 12 appropriation bills. This bill before us has no limiting effect. Those appropriations will either come or we will have continuing resolutions to authorize in an appropriate manner the budget authority for running our National Government on the domestic side.

Now every one of these things that the good Senator from Arizona is suggesting that we cut or reduce, every one of them will be in an appropriation bill. And he will certainly, understanding his tenacity, he will certainly offer amendments, I assume, in the Appropriations Committee, since he is a member. And if he is unsuccessful here on the floor in those particular bills—and I must say that that is a far more consistent method of handling it than to come here on the Senate floor when we have a cumulative budget authority for all domestic accounts and to say, "Now we expect your process to work and you appropriators will do your job, but we would like to tell you right here in this bill you cannot do this, and you must do this and you cannot do the other."

I really hope we do not do that. I do not know how effective it is going to be if we do. I cannot imagine that the U.S. House is going to change the total appropriation process of our country here on a bill which is establishing overall caps. But maybe the House would like to do this. Maybe if we have this, they would accept it.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. DOMENICI. Yes.

Mr. DECONCINI. The Senator raises a very sensitive point. As he knows, since both sit on the Appropriations Committee, we are very protective about who tells us what to do. It seems to me, at least for the 8 years that this Senator has sat on the Appropriations Committee, we have a difficult time. The Senator from Georgia has consistently offered several of these amendments, as I have, and unless a very good coalition is put together with a lot of hard work and there is time—and often there is not time in the Appropriations Committee—we are somewhat stuck.

So I guess what I am saying to the Senator from New Mexico is that there is an opportunity to do something that I suspect the Senator from New Mexico would vote for in the Appropriations Committee—and I believe he has; I do not want to quote him on that, but I believe he has in the past—here is an opportunity to do it right now, to do what the Senator from Georgia, the Senator from Arizona, and many other Members of this Senate have wanted to do, and that is to put some caps on this so the Appropriations Committee is indeed restrained obligationwise. And we can do it one time. We can do it right now for travel, for consultant fees, for the debt collection, and a number of other areas.

I respect the Senator from New Mexico very much, and he knows that I do. I realize his concern about the budget process versus the appropriation process. And being on the Appropriations Committee I appreciate that. It just seems to me that it makes good sense to do it here when we are not touching those caps. I cannot see that it would make a whole lot of difference. If the House does not like it, that is really not our concern; that is their concern.

Mr. DOMENICI. First of all, I clearly do not want to have a vote without calling the chairman of the Appropriations Committee to the floor. And it may be that I will have to ask my friend from Georgia, who is here, to handle this matter for a few months while I go to talk to the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

I really think all those who appropriate are going to be genuinely concerned about this process that the Senator from Arizona is going to, for the first time, put in here on the Senate floor that in advance of appropriations you take specific items within future appropriation bills and as part of a cap you begin to tell them with specificity what they can do.

We have made a very honest effort telling the appropriation process here that these caps have nothing to do with their ability to appropriate, their ability to decide how they are going to use the total amount of money that is allowed each year, which has been historically, since the 1930's, clearly their prerogative.

Now having said that, let me say something else to the Senate. The Senate should understand, in addition to this very different process, I doubt very much the U.S. House would under any circumstance accept it in conference. That does not matter, maybe we want to do it anyway. I think it is rather foolhardy to do it if we know that under any conditions they are not going to look at it.

But likewise I think you should know you do not really save any money because the distinguished Senator has not reduced the caps. So what he is saying is: "I want you to save $4.3 billion by spending my way but I want you to keep on spending in exactly the same amount that was heretofore authorized in this amendment."

Now that is interesting because what that is saying is that we are not saving anything. But we are not spending in some areas that some would not like here. And they picked some—some are called reform; maybe they are and maybe they are not.

A real test of savings would be to amend the cap and bring it down $4.3 billion and say if you are going to save the $4.3 billion that the distinguished Senator says in the manner he suggests by directing the appropriations with specificity even to a capped bill, lower the $4.3 billion and do not spend it. That would be a good test of whether you want to save money.

This $4.3 billion is going to be available to spend elsewhere because the cap is not changed. And I submit it is just an exercise in declaring sort of, maybe, almost an intent. Sort of a sense of the Senate, because it is not going to go beyond the Senate; to produce appropriation bills on this particular bill is not going to happen.

If you wanted a sense of the Senate that you want to cut consulting fees and other things but you do not want to cut Government, you want to leave the number in, you do not want to cut the freeze or the 5-percent growth, I think that would be a rather interesting vote and probably would receive some rather handsome support that we would like to see consultants and travel, public information, reduced before we reduce other things.

Now, having said that, my good friend from Georgia wants to speak, I assume, in favor of the amendment. He is here. And I am going to be gone for about 15 or 20 minutes. I would only ask, if we finish the debate, that one of you ask for a quorum call so that I might talk to the chairman of Appropriations Committee.

Mr. DECONCINI. Before the Senator from New Mexico leaves the floor, I would like to ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I rise to thank my colleague from Arizona, Senator DECONCINI, for introducing this amendment and letting me sponsor with him this amendment.

I do not think anybody could have been any more eloquent than the Senator from Arizona in stating the case for what this amendment is all about. He and I both serve on the Appropriations Committee, so I think we know where the money goes. I think we try to restrain that spending.

Now we have a proposal before us, the Republican proposal, which is more backloaded than frontloaded. That means there are more spending reductions, or more impact, on the deficit not in fiscal year 1985, but in 1986 and 1987. This amendment is an attempt to frontload it and put something in fiscal year 1985. The objective in other words, is to try to reduce the deficit that everybody in this country is concerned with. It puts a small torpedo into the water leading toward some pork-barrel-spending programs. It will reduce some of the logrolling because we will take several billion dollars out that people cannot spend any more.

It is not done with mirrors. It is spelled out very clearly in the amendment, the reductions and where we would take them from.

This amendment puts some roadblocks in front of that speeding train to try to slow it down. Once again, the objective is to reduce the deficit, and slow Federal spending. The amendment prevents us from ignoring fiscal year 1985. Let us not try to cover up this weakness in this proposal. Let us try to fix it. Let us try to add more reductions to it. As this year progresses, the proposals that the Senator has put forward in this amendment in fact probably later on in this year are going to more than highlight the waste that is in the budget. I am not going to get into the Grace Commission report. It has 2,478 items, over $400 billion worth of reductions.

But I think what that report did—and I think what this amendment does—is sort of puts a magnifying glass on the Appropriations Committee. What we are trying to do is take out some of this overspending.

The Senator has done, as I said, an eloquent job of laying out this amendment. Once again, we have a Government spending $90 million an hour, and I believe it is time to slow it down.

We want to slow it down in a way that is not going to hurt the people in the country. But will slow it down so it will help them. I have not been able to see one thing in the amendment that we have proposed that is going to injure anybody west of the Potomac. It may injure the "Beltway Bandits." It may injure somebody in this Government that wants to leave town on a first-class airfare. They may have to go tourist or for a lower rate. But I think what we will see coming up here in the next week is a lot of proposals trying to improve the package that is on the floor. A lot ot them are going to fail. Probably most of them are going to fail. But if we have one that is reasonable, we ought to try to pass it. All of us need to be objective, and say this is one that we can really not only buy but one that will do good on this budget process which we are trying to improve upon.

I do not think anybody in America thinks the budget process we are using is too swift. Looking down through all of the options that we will have, we have already voted on the 10-percent reduction. It did not get too many votes across the board. We got 27 or 28 votes. We are going to have freeze amendments coming up. We are going to have some more across-the-board cuts, some more Grace Commission proposals.

I intend to offer the line-item-veto proposal. There are many items that we will be looking at in the next week. When we have one that is rational, one that we can look at and be able to reduce spending with the simple technique—that is, we have pinpointed the items that can be reduced that are not going to hurt anybody or any program—then I think probably in all honesty it ought to be accepted by voice vote. But it probably will not be.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Yes.

Mr. DECONCINI. I want to thank the Senator for his complimentary remarks. Much credit goes to the Senator from Georgia's efforts, particularly in the consultant area, within the Appropriations Committee that we have labored with for a long time. I call to the attention of the Senate, being on the minority side of the aisle, that I am not tampering with the Republican budget bill. I would much rather see repeal of the third-year tax cut, and many other things reduced here. But this is the package that the leadership has put up. Being in the minority, we understand where the votes are. We are not reducing the cap. We are reorganizing the priorities within that cap. As has been pointed out by the Senator from Georgia, there are many areas in which we overspend. This amendment before us which Senator MATTINGLY and myself have offered attempts to put some limitations on the obligations.

That means that the Appropriations Committee, if they want, can allocate that $4.3 billion in other areas which may be more important, and still stay within the "Republican caps" that have been put on.

It is important to understand this is directing them to do what most of us think they ought to do; that is, the Appropriations Committee—and maybe we will. If we do not succeed here, I can assure you—and I am sure the Senator from Georgia can assure you—that we will be right there once again going through it one time after another with 12 or 13 different appropriations bills, trying to seek out where the consultants are spending the billions of dollars, where the overlap in the motor vehicle program is, and where the debt collections can be collected. It is a laborious process. But we will continue to put forth this effort.

It is a good amendment. I hope that the Republican leadership would not considered it an assault on their great program to reduce the deficit here but would take it in the spirit that it is offered by the Senators from Georgia and Mississippi; that is, putting some restrictions on the obligations within those caps.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona makes a comment about being in the minority, and attacking the majority program. You and I both know, serving on the Appropriations Committee, that one cannot tell the difference between the majority and the minority because it is one big cash register that has not been able to identify who the Republican is or who the Democrat is. But when you are in there, you are spending. What the American public is looking for is the people who want to put the reins on. I am glad to cosponsor this with my colleague from Arizona because we sort of walk down the path together when it comes to trying to root out the wasteful spending on that committee along with other members. Sometimes I wish there were more of us.

With that, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, this is one of those meat cleaver approaches to budgetary matters rather than a scalpel. I have never known meat cleavers to accomplish very much. I say that because even though there may be merit in the application of this particular proposal on an appropriation by appropriation process for measures, this matter is ill-timed because the Appropriations Committee has not even established 302 target figures. The appropriations process has only been at the subcommittee level where we have been holding hearings, hearing witnesses and agency representatives.

To, in effect, establish this reduction before we even have a cap established really kind of amazes me because of the utter illogic to the whole approach.

I might say that if this had been proposed by an executive branch office of our Federal Government, I am sure that the overwhelming majority of the Members of the Senate would rise up in great anguish, crying that this was an invasion of the legislative prerogative and responsibility. And yet we are inviting the executive branch of Government to take an action that we ourselves have the responsibility to take.

I notice it is bipartisan. I would have thought it might have been—well, I do not know. It really is an amazing proposal to be made to say, in effect, before the appropriations process has really gotten under way in terms of allocations, 302 targets, and so forth, before we have even agreed on a cap, that we are going to ask the executive branch of Government to diminish the allocation by $750 million.

Again, I could easily support this proposal, perhaps, as it would be made program by program or appropriation bill by appropriation bill, but these simplistic notions that, somehow, across the board, we are going to accomplish some kind of budgetary restraint or control or deficit reduction—having worked for about 18 years at the State level, I have seen these approaches many times in legislatures at the State level. Never once in history have I ever seen this approach really turn out to be other than disaster in terms of across-the-board reductions.

It sounds so simplistic: Across the board; everybody is treated fairly, equitably. Well, that is an assumption that is false on its very surface, because it assumes that everybody has been treated fairly up to this point and they are all moving from the same baseline.

Mr. President, I understand that everyone has spoken who wants to speak on it. I hope the Senate will agree with the motion I make now to table the amendment.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oregon. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. EAST), the Senator from Washington (Mr. EVANS), the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. SIMPSON), and the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), is absent because of death in the family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 78, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I understand that the yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment. The distinguished Senator from Arizona has prevailed, and that is not subject to equivocation. If we agree to accept this amendment, I wonder if he will agree to vitiate the order for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DECONCINI. I do.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 3032) was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DECONCINI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I thank the Members who supported this amendment and the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee. His arguments were very eloquent, and I know his intentions are to stay within his budget control and the hard work he has done to put this together. I appreciate the position he found himself in.

I also thank the Senator from Georgia for his outstanding work on the floor in passing the amendment. It would not have happened without his support.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I thank the Senator.

AMENDMENT NO. 3033

(Purpose: To establish a National Commission on Federal Spending Reform)

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY) proposes an amendment numbered 3033.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of amendment No. 3004, insert the following:

It is the sense of the Senate that:

One, federal spending currently exceeds three-fourths of a trillion dollars and, according to the Congressional Budget Office, will surpass the trillion dollar a year level before the end of this decade; and

Two, an ever-growing share of the federal budget is uncontrollable; and

Three, since 1970, as a percentage of gross national product, federal receipts and federal outlays have averaged 19.2 percent and 21.9 percent of GNP respectively; and

Four, detailed examination of historical trends point to expenditure growth as the real culprit of our ever-diminishing ability to balance the federal government's books; and

Five, the obvious result of this economic imbalance is persistent deficits; and

Six, deficits do matter, for they signal something is fundamentally wrong with the trend in government spending; and

Seven, the continued increase in federal spending results in large budget deficits; and

Eight, large budget deficits cause a rise in interest rates and inflation and can choke off the current economic recovery; and

Nine, a National Commission on Federal Spending Reform, similar to the National Commission on Social Security Reform, should be established to study the growth in federal spending and report to the Congress after January 1, 1985, on those steps Congress might consider for the purpose of reforming federal spending programs and curbing their growth in an effort to regain control of the federal budget and reduce the federal deficit; and

Ten, such a commission should—

(a) be composed of distinguished leaders from the executive and legislative branches of government, business, labor, and education, and

(b) consult with other private and public sector experts for recommendations about reforms that would best address existing problems.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, today I am introducing an amendment which calls for the establishment of a bipartisan National Commission on Federal Spending Reform.

Federal spending is quickly approaching a trillion dollars a year. In other words, for the past several decades, Federal spending has been on automatic pilot. Any examination of historical trends points to expenditure growth as the real culprit in Congress' inability to balance the Federal Government's books.

The American public understands the cause of the large Federal budget deficit and how to eradicate it. A recent Gallup poll found that a large majority of Americans are aware that the Government is operating at a loss and 70 percent said spending cuts are the way to reduce the deficit. Only 16 percent favored raising taxes. While some would have you believe that all stones have been turned over, the American public will not be fooled by the Washington mentality that the Federal budget cannot be reduced.

Again, the amendment calls for the establishment of a bipartisan National Commission on Federal Spending Reform. Such a Commission would be established to study and review the growth in Federal spending and report to Congress, after January 1, 1985, on those steps Congress might consider for the purpose of making fundamental spending reforms in an effort to regain control of the Federal budget and reduce the Federal deficit.

Unlike other commissions to address the Federal deficit, this Commission would be instructed to address fundamental spending reform rather than to rely on tax increases in addressing the deficit issue. History repeatedly has illustrated that, for the most part, tax increases finance added Government spending and do little to reduce the deficit. The public will not continue to be fooled by token stabs at fundamental spending reform, even in the name of a downpayment on reducing the deficit. Moreover, the creation of this Commission provides a way to achieve bipartisanship on fundamental spending reform that currently is so difficult to achieve in the Congress.

Deficits do matter, for they indicate that something is fundamentally wrong in the trend in Government spending. The only way to reverse the prospect of continuing large future budget deficits is to make the necessary fundamental spending reforms. Making recommendations to accomplish the necessary reforms would be the task of the Commission.

I encourage my colleagues to support the creation of a bipartisan National Commission on Federal Spending Reform in an effort to reverse the current fiscal crisis.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, we have reviewed the amendment, and we have adopted it before. It is a sense of the Congress with reference to the creation of a Commission, and I have no objection to its adoption by the Senate.

It is my understanding that the distinguished Senator from Florida who is managing on the minority side had no objection.

Mr. CHILES. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. The Senator from Florida has indicated that he approves of the statement the Senator from New Mexico just made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further debate, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment (No. 3033) was agreed to.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, there will be no further rollcall votes tonight, and it is the understanding of the leadership that the managers of the bill do not wish to proceed on this bill tomorrow. We will soon finish our routine business and stand in recess until 11 a.m. on Monday morning.

There will be no further rollcall votes today, and we will not be in session tomorrow.

REAGAN DEFENSE PROGRAM BELOW CARTER PLAN

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, on March 15, 1984, under congressional pressure, President Reagan agreed to $22 billion in further cuts in defense spending. As a result, the last vestiges of the 1981 Reagan defense build-up were eliminated, and the Reagan defense program is $5 to $10 billion below the levels of defense spending which President Carter felt were required but which were rejected by the American people as inadequate.

Although the Washington Post, the New York Times, and other so-called national media have studiously ignored this subject—about which the public ought to be better informed—the New York Post of March 26, 1984, published a superb editorial giving the facts on defense spending and bringing into focus the adverse national security effects of congressional attacks on the 1981 Reagan plan.

At a time when the number of Russian nuclear warheads aimed at the American people has almost doubled in little more than 4 years, I believe that Senators should take the time to read the New York Post editorial and to consider the implications of the facts outlined in it.

Accordingly, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Post, Mar. 26, 1984]

DO NOT LET FALSE ECONOMY IMPERIL NATION'S DEFENSES

President Reagan's package deal with the Republican Congressional leaders for a $150 billion reduction in the deficit over the next three years clearly is not the end of the affair especially as it affects defense.

Indeed, the election-year battle over the deficit is only just beginning.

Reagan says he agreed to cut defense spending by $57 billion over the period only after the Republicans pledged that the new military budget proposal would be treated as the floor—not as a ceiling for still further cuts.

The President should watch out.

House Speaker Tip O'Neill describes Reagan's concession to the Republicans as merely a first step and Democratic House leader Rep. Jim Wright says: "We think we can do a better job."

DOUBLE CUT

The "better job" which the House Democrats propose is to cut defense spending by $95.5 billion—almost double the Republican figure—and impose much higher taxes and delay by at least two years the plan to link tax brackets to inflation.

When push comes to shove in an election year, what is the prospect for holding the line on defense spending?

Let no one be under any illusions. Under Reagan, there has actually been a steady reduction in the growth of defense spending.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff, in their latest posture statement to Congress, make this quite clear.

"The original (Reagan) defense program submitted in March 1981, was estimated to add $116 billion spending for FY 1982 through FY 1986 over the total proposed by the (Carter) administration.

"To date, almost $104 billion of that increment has been removed through a series of reductions and economies of operation—as well as the actions of the Congress."

The total cuts—by Congress and through Pentagon economies—left only $12 billion for increased spending before Reagan made his deal with the Republican leaders.

CARTER'S FIGURES

His compromise cut $6 billion from the proposed FY 1985 budget and a further $16 billion from FY 1986 spending.

The Defense Dept. is now operating at $10 billion below Reagan's original request for increased spending.

A comparison of President Carter's last budget in January 1981 with Reagan's budget when he took office and what he has now accepted is instructive (by fiscal years):

	Fiscal year—
	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
Carter:
January 1981	184	210	238	268	300
Reagan:
March 1981	189	226	256	304	343
March 1984	187	210	240	266	294

Reagan is $123 billion below the level of defense spending he originally proposed and at least $5 billion below what Carter considered necessary.

Who would believe it? Carter, of course, tried to hold defense spending down during his four years and largely succeeded. But Afghanistan opened his eyes and when he left office real growth in defense spending was running at 12 percent annually.

Since Reagan's inauguration it has declined steadily to the present 4 percent.

How does this conform with reality?

Richard D. DeLauer, Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering, has provided Congress with a disturbing answer.

SOVIET OUTLAYS

Except for major surface ships, between 1974–83 the Soviets have substantially outproduced the U.S.—not only for their own forces but also for their surrogates around the world. The Warsaw Pact military advantage over NATO in major weapons is two to one.

DeLauer lists 50 of roughly 200 Soviet weapons programs expected to become operational in the 1980s—to be added to 80 systems deployed since 1980 (twice the U.S. deployment).

Item: Soviet millitary research institutes doubled from 1500 to 1960 to more than 3000 today. Millitary R&D now accounts for virtually all Soviet research, compared with 30 per cent in the U.S.

Item: The dollar cost of Soviet military investment over the last 10 years has exceeded that of the U.S. by $450 billion—due to increased R&D spending.

Item: The Soviets spent $200 billion more to buy weapons than the U.S. in the past 10 years. The cost of Soviet weapons R&D alone was $185 billion more than in the U.S.

Item: Over the past 10 years, total dollar costs of Soviet strategic forces exceeded that of the U.S. by about $250 billion (in constant 1985 dollars) almost double U.S. spending for strategic forces.

Item: The cost of Soviet strategic defense weapons—the world's most extensive—was many more times that of U.S. spending on bomber forces.

Item: The estimated inventory value of Soviet strategic offensive weapons has exceeded that of the U.S. since the mid-1980s. It is now about one-fourth greater. During the 1970s detente—or SALT—period the U.S. "essentially eliminated strategic defense procurement and forces."

HOLD THE LINE

"While there is significant uncertainty in these estimates," says DeLauer, "this long-term trend cannot be allowed to continue."

Is it reasonable, in an election year, to expect that we at least can hold the line?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDREWS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

CALENDAR

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask my good friend if he will agree to deal with some items on the calendar. I say to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, the Democratic leader, that it would be my intention to ask the Senate to consider the following actions: Calendar No. 549, S. 1982, to be indefinitely postponed; Calendar item No. 755, S. 2303, to pass that bill; Calendar No. 760, S. 1806, to pass that bill; Calendar No. 765, S. 1711, to pass that bill; Calendar No. 76, S. 501, to pass that bill; Calendar Nos. 783 and 784, which are S. 2061 and S. 2468, to indefinitely postpone those bills; and to pass Calendar No. 795, S. 2597, Calendar No. 797, H.R. 3376, and Calendar No. 798, H.R. 3555.

Would that procedure meet with the minority leader's approval?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished assistant Republican leader. These matters have been cleared on this side. We are ready to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the acting majority leader is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the three bills to be indefinitely postponed are Calendar Order No. 549, S. 1982; Calendar Order No. 783, S. 2061; and Calendar Order No. 784, S. 2468. I now ask unanimous consent that those bills be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the items which I suggested to the minority leader be considered en bloc, and that all of those requests be granted en bloc.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I will not object.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 14. This Act and the amendments and repeals made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1984.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to expeditiously approve S. 2303, the Alcohol, Drug Abuse and Mental Health Services Block Grant Amendments of 1984. This is vitally important legislation to millions of families throughout our Nation who are tragically touched by alcoholism, drug abuse, or mental illness. This sad toll is enormous and each of us knows many people affected by one of these illnesses—a child robbed of his life by a drunk driver; a nephew, cousin, or neighbor shattered by drug abuse; or a friend touched by mental illness searching for reasons and cures.

The issues of treatment for alcohol, drug abuse, and mental illnesses are among the most widely highlighted in Congress. With the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981, Congress consolidated a number of categorical health programs into four health block grants. One of the health blocks established with this enactment was the alcohol, drug abuse, and mental health services (ADMS) block grant. This block consolidated into a single authority of grants to the States various Federal categorical programs for: First, formula and project grants and contracts for alcohol abuse services; second, formula and project grants and contracts for drug abuse services; and third, grants for community mental health centers (CMHC's).

The ADMS block and other health blocks were established in 1981 to provide State and local governments greater flexibility and decisionmaking authority in focusing Federal, State, and local resources on needs and priorities they know best and in ways they believe are best suited to local conditions. Block grants were also intended to eliminate duplication and overlapping of services and to allow States to better integrate and coordinate services funded by several levels of Government.

Under the ADMS block, States may use their allotments for: First, planning, establishing, maintaining, coordinating, and evaluating projects for the development of more effective prevention, treatment, and rehabilitation programs and activities to deal with alcohol and drug abuse; and second, for grants to community mental health centers for the following services and for planning, administration, and educational activities related to these activities:

First, services for chronically mentally ill individuals, which include identification of chronically mentally ill individuals and assistance to such individuals in gaining access to essential services through the assignment of case managers;

Second, identification and assessment of severely mentally disturbed children and adolescents and provisions of appropriate services to such individuals;

Third, identification and assessment of mentally ill elderly individuals and provision of appropriate services to such individuals;

Fourth, services for identifiable populations which are currently underserved in the State; and Fifth, coordination of mental health and health care services provided within health care centers.

This bill contains other provisions that allow States to be more responsive to their special needs and priorities. My committee learned of the rapidly growing problem of alcoholism and alcohol and drug abuse among women and the need for special programs. It is estimated that up to one half of the approximately 10 million alcoholics in this country are women. I learned specifically from a prominent Utah alcohol and drug treatment provider that most women lost family relationships as soon as their chemical dependency became problematic for the family. Consequently, there are minimal resources either for child care or the financing of treatment. More effective treatment and prevention programs are required to reduce specifically the consequences and costs of alcohol and substance abuse among women. This legislation provides the States the greatest flexibility possible in designing treatment and prevention services programs for women.

I am also pleased to report that we have expanded services to States to plan, coordinate, and improve community services for the chronically mentally ill, seriously mentally disturbed children and the elderly. We know that the current community support program provided thousands of families help in securing vital services for mentally ill family members—housing services, educational services, counseling services—all aimed at preparing chronically mentally ill persons for community living. In addition, this bill also expands services for families who have a mentally disturbed child. There are estimates of over 3 million children and adolescents in the United States who suffer from severe mental disability.

Finally, this bill expands its potential services to include our elderly citizens in need of compassionate mental health care. Tragically, our older Americans have a higher rate of mental illness than any other population. Evidence shows dramatic increases of mental illness in nursing home patients, where many of the residents show significant emotional and behaviorial dysfunctions. Moreover, many of these disorders are treatable. This new program may enable many of our elderly citizens suffering from a form of mental illness to return to their community and obtain home health services. Outreach programs and better coordination between mental health and primary health care programs are essential for meeting the needs of the elderly.

I encourage my colleagues to favorably approve this legislation. We can make our statement that we continue support for families, for communities, and for States treating and preventing the destruction and despair that can result from alcohol abuse, drug abuse and mental illness.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to support passage of S. 2303 which reauthorizes the alcohol, drug abuse and mental health block grant. I particularly wish to thank Senator HATCH for supporting inclusion in the bill of the Grassley-Proxmire equity adjustment, which will provide a modest increase in block grant funds for several States, including Iowa and Wisconsin, which were severely deprived by the allocation formula adopted for the block grant when the program was created in 1981. This present distribution formula is simply inequitable, 22 States, receive fewer dollars under this program than they would receive if the funds were distributed simply on the basis of each States share of the Nation's population.

Unfortunately, with 28 States receiving more than their fair share, and with each of those States determined to protect the funds they are now receiving, it would cost tens of millions of dollars to insure that all States received their fair share and that no State would be hurt by such a change. With the Federal deficit the way it is, that simply was not a responsible option.

Therefore, my staff helped draft a proposal for an equity adjustment to the block grant formula and Senator HATCH graciously consented to include it among his chairman's amendments to the bill in committee. This equity amendment would insure that no State could receive less than 50 percent of what it would get under a population-base formula.

Adoption of this equity adjustment is a step in the right direction. The most deprived States will be brought closer to what would be a fair share of the block grant moneys without at the same time costing the Treasury any additional money. This equity adjustment will not cost any additional money because it simply reallocates a small amount of money among the States.

Unfortunately, the most deprived States, including Iowa, will still not receive their fair share under terms of our proposal. The Congress is scheduled to get in 1985 recommendations for a major reform of the funding formula for this program from the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. Once we have these recommendations, I intend to fight for a formula which will insure that Iowa gets its fair share of the block grant money.

In the meantime, the equity adjustment will help those States like Iowa and Wisconsin which are most severely deprived under terms of the allocation formula.

(By request of Mr. BYRD, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased that this bill includes a number of initiatives to improve services to high priority underserved populations, including establishing a grant program directed at the needs of alcoholic women, raising the funding level for the effective community support program for the chronically mentally ill, expanding the community support program to include seriously mentally ill children and the elderly, requiring the Secretary to develop an adequate data system on mental illness and to provide technical assistance to States, and providing grant funds to States to develop comprehensive mental health plans.

A number of these initiatives were adopted, in modified form, from S. 2452, an omnibus health services reauthorization bill I introduced on March 20 and which was cosponsored by all the Democratic members of the Labor and Human Resources Committee.

While this bill is a step in the right direction, it does not go far enough. I believe that States need to be held accountable for the effectiveness and adequacy of the services they provide to the chronically mentally ill and need to be provided additional funding and incentives to adequately serve severely mentally ill children, the elderly, and populations in areas that lack mental health services.

The treatment of the chronically mentally ill, in particular, is a national disgrace.

Psychotropic drugs have largely emptied our Nation's State mental hospitals. Tragically, however, the promise deinstitutionalization has offered for a better and more fulfilling life for our Nation's chronically mentally ill has largely gone unfulfilled. Without adequate community support and services, hundreds of thousands have been effectively abandoned by our society, abandoned to a desolate world of single room occupancy hotels, slum-like board and care homes, a world of sleeping on grates and begging for meals, of repetitious and unnecessary psychotic episodes that lead to costly hospitalization, stabilization, and discharge, only to begin the cycle again.

The community support program funded on a demonstration basis by NIMH as well as a number of successful programs operated by States has proven there is a better way. With effective case-management services, a developed continuum of care from institutions to independent living, and inexpensive but well-planned social support services, this tragic cycle can be broken. Indeed, evaluations of the community support program have shown rates of hospitalization 50-percent lower than for comparable populations without access to community services.

ADAMHA block grant expenditures are a tiny proportion of total national costs for chronic mental illness. Medicaid and State-only mental health expenditures on the chronically mentally ill were $5.4 billion in 1983, compared to less than $.3 billion for ADAMHA block grant funds. But non-PHS funds were overwhelmingly spent on institutional rather than community-based care, and, in the case of Medicaid, can not even be tracked to services for the chronically mentally ill except through special studies.

Other populations that have been neglected in our current mental health service delivery system are the elderly, children, and those resident in underserved areas. The elderly receive community services at a lower rate than the population as a whole, even though an estimated 10 to 25 percent in the community have some degree of mental impairment and the suicide rate of the elderly is 1½ times the rate for all ages. Of 3 million seriously disturbed children, an estimated two thirds are not getting the treatment they need. Our bill would require the States to include in their plan a program for improving services to these populations.

While ADAMHA funds are a small proportion of total expenditures, they can be vital in creating incentives for a reformed mental health system. I believe that the administration philosophy of simply giving money to States in the form of block grants without standards, accountability, or uniform reporting is wrong. Rather, block grants should be a component of a creative Federal-State partnership that assures national needs are met.

This bill is a significant improvement over current law, but it does not assert the national interest in and responsibility for these highly dependent populations forcefully enough. A more responsible approach would make receipt of ADAMHA funds contingent on States developing a comprehensive plan for an effective community-based treatment system for the chronically mentally ill and a program to address the needs of the elderly, children, and residents of areas without services. Such a State plan would include a system for accounting for all funds spent on the chronically mentally ill, and would track progress toward plan implementation. Case management services—the heart of the effective treatment program—should be fully phased in over a 3-year period.

It should also be recognized that the funding levels provided in this bill, while an improvement over current levels, are less than two-thirds of 1980 spending in real terms. In view of the needs of this population, this is not good enough. While the great bulk of mental health services should come from reorientation of existing funding, significant increases in PHS support are also necessary.

One additional issue deserves mention. Since 1981, ADAMHA staffing has declined by almost 50 percent, from 1,919 to 1,045. Further declines in staffing are not appropriate in view of the expanded responsibilities established by this legislation. Accordingly, the Secretary should maintain staffing allocated to ADAMHA functions at current levels and should assure location of these expanded responsibilities in organizational units with the expertise necessary to fulfill the responsibilities established by this legislation efficiently and effectively.●

TITLE IV—EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 401. Except as otherwise provided, the amendments made by this Act shall become effective upon the date of enactment.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as amended.

AWARDING OF SPECIAL CONGRESSIONAL GOLD MEDALS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2597) to authorize the awarding of special congressional gold medals to the daughter of Harry S. Truman, to Lady Bird Johnson, and to Elie Wiesel.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, it is a very special pleasure for me to speak on behalf of this bill to authorize the President—on behalf of the Congress—to present a special gold medal to Lady Bird Johnson in recognition of her many contributions to her Nation.

I introduced legislation to authorize the presentation of a medal to Lady Bird Johnson on October 7. Since that time, a majority of the Senate had joined me in cosponsoring the proposal. Companion legislation, introduced by Congressman HENRY B. GONZALEZ, has been approved by the House.

The overwhelming support for this proposal is indicative, Mr. President, of the broad, bipartisan agreement I have found all across the political spectrum when it comes to Mrs. Johnson. Republican and Democrats, liberals and conservatives all agreee that Lady Bird Johnson is a remarkable, talented individual who has left an indelible imprint of loveliness on the American landscape. She has enriched the lives of millions of Americans and provided her many friends with the touch of grace, and warmth, and charm so many of us associate with Mrs. Johnson.

Lady Bird Johnson has been a successful businesswoman; she was one of the most active and effective First Ladies in the history of America; she has been a loving mother, a valued political counselor, and an active regent of the University of Texas. There is no question that Lady Bird Johnson has given generously of her talents and her time to make America a more beautiful and just land.

I think it is only appropriate for America to present Lady Bird Johnson with a token of appreciation for her efforts over the years. The medal provided for in this legislation can reflect only a few rays of light and warmth that Lady Bird Johnson has shared with America, but it is an important symbol for a woman who stands as a symbol of what is finest and most noble in our American experience.

During her tenure in the White House, Lady Bird Johnson took on the tough issues. She promoted the Head Start Program and Lyndon Johnson's "War on Poverty." Her efforts to make this land of America more beautiful took her on a journey of more than 200,000 miles.

Because of Lady Bird Johnson's efforts, our Nation's Capitol is one of the most beautiful cities in the world. As we enjoy the springtime splendor of this city, the brilliant reds and yellows of tulips, the plantings along the Potomac and the vast stretches of highways across this land, we are benefiting from her touch. Lady Bird Johnson let millions of Americans know a deeper meaning of beauty, one they could see reflected in the commitment and energy and caring of their First Lady.

President Johnson's decision not to seek reelection removed Lady Bird Johnson from the political visibility of the White House, but it did not dampen her concern for the landscape of America and the people who inhabit it. She has worked hard and effectively to improve the education of the young people of Texas through her service as a regent of the University of Texas. She has led the effort to preserve and protect the incredible beauty of Texas wildflowers.

Lady Bird Johnson also finds time to remain active at the LBJ Library and School of Public Affairs, she manages her communications interests and is involved with the National Park Service and the National Geographic Society. But even with all this activity and devotion to public service, Lady Bird Johnson has not lost sight of what is important in her life. "The core of it all is my two daughters and seven grandchildren," is the way Lady Bird Johnson puts it.

These days, Lady Bird Johnson claims to be indulging herself. I think she has a right to indulge herself, but those of us who have known her over the years, those of us who have benefited from her example, would like to mark that indulgence with a tribute to a great and wonderful woman.

I sincerely believe that the medal for Lady Bird Johnson is richly deserved; it is a medal for inspiration and beauty, and effective action on behalf of America.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to approve this legislation and join with us in paying tribute to a great American, Mrs. Lady Bird Johnson.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, S. 2597 is a bill, in part, authorizing the casting of a gold medal in recognition of the tremendous contribution of Elie Wiesel, the well-known author, humanitarian, philosopher, and historian. He is best known, Mr. President, for his contribution in helping all of us to remember the tragedies of the holocaust, both the horror of that period, but more importantly, the triumph of human beings who suffered through it.

Our effort is not only to remember what occurred during those terrible days, but also strongly to encourage mankind not to allow it to happen again.

This legislation, Mr. President, was introduced by myself and my good friend and colleague from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), along with 39 other cosponsors. An identical piece of legislation has been introduced in the other body, and is cosponsored by half of the membership of the House.

It is especially appropriate to honor Elie Wiesel at this time. On April 29 we will begin a week of "Days of Remembrance" for victims of the Holocaust. It is our duty to respect the memory of those who died in the camps and to search for a better understanding of the cause of their suffering so that we can avoid future recurrences.

I know of no other individual who has so diligently carried out the above tasks. No matter how hard we try, it is impossible for us to personally feel the horror of the Holocaust as strongly as Elie Wiesel does. Forty years ago this year, at the age of 15, he was interned with his family in the center of Nazi brutality—Auschwitz. He managed to survive with his younger sister; his parents and two other sisters were not as lucky. He saw his father shot before his eyes—a brutal image that is indelibly imprinted in his memory.

Since then, Elie Wiesel has devoted his life to keeping alive the memory of the Holocaust, speaking for the millions who were silenced in the crematoriums of Auschwitz, Dachau, and Treblinka. Beginning with his first novel Night, he has gone on to publish 25 works of literature which eloquently and movingly express the horrors which he emphasizes we must not forget and, in turn, must prevent from ever recurring.

Alexandra Johnson, of the Christian Science Monitor, writes how Elie Wiesel, in his last novel, retells the story of the "Just Man who attempted to save Sodom." The Just Man reacted to the silence of those he pleaded with by saying:

> If I still shout today, if I still scream, it is to prevent man from ultimately changing me.

This passage illustrates the central theme of Elie Wiesel's works: Like the Just Man, he must bear the burden of a survivor, the need to tell the tale that must be told in order to prevent man's silence and indifference from allowing atrocities to occur. As chairman of the President's Commission on the Holocaust, he led the effort to document the world's silence from 1942–45, when Allied leaders knew about camps like Auschwitz but did not act in time.

He also reported how at the monument to slain Ukrainians at Babi Yar in Kiev, U.S.S.R., there was no mention of the thousands of Jews who were murdered. Elie's humanitarian efforts in light of atrocities in Cambodia, Biafra, and Latin America show us that we must be continually vigilant in opposing inhumanity. We must not allow the silence that has grown since World War II to let us slacken in our fight against hatred and brutality. Men like Elie Wiesel remind us that we can not be satisfied until violence and inhumanity have been eliminated from the world.

Frequently cited as a candidate for the Nobel Prize, Elie Wiesel has won the Prix Medicis, Eleanor Roosevelt Award, and the American Liberties Medallion. He has been awarded honorary doctorates from several universities, and his classes and lectures are continually filled to capacity.

Elie Wiesel devotes his work to serious, sobering issues, and sadly admits that injustice is still rampant throughout the world. However, he has not lost some sense of optimism that we can use our knowledge of the past to attempt to perfect an imperfect world. He stated:

> This is the Jewish belief, that out of total darkness will come total light. My night won't end, and yet other things are possible—day, hope.

Elie Wiesel deserves this commendation because, as the "Just Man" of that parable, he is a symbol of the courage and unflinching determination we all should muster against all forms of ignorance and tyranny. Elie Wiesel has one central wish: that mankind strive to achieve a collective morality which avoids indifference, silence, and despair. Honoring Elie Wiesel makes a statement of those values and actions which we admire. We should go one step further, however, we must emulate Elie Wiesel—we must all become "Just Men."

Mr. President, I urge adoption of this measure on behalf of myself and my 40 cosponsors. Our firm hope would be that the other body, as soon as possible, would take similar action so that we might recognize the tremendous contribution of this marvelous American, a wonderful citizen of our country and the world, who has given us much of his own life to cause us to remember the burdens of the past in order to secure for humanity a better future.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today the Senate is considering a bill to provide for the awarding of a gold medal to the humanitarian and internationally acclaimed author, Elie Wiesel. As one who has long been acquainted with Mr. Wiesel and his work, I strongly support this legislation and urge my colleagues to vote for it.

Elie Wiesel is one of the most eloquent and certainly the foremost spokesman for the victims of the Holocaust. He has used his many talents as a gifted writer to bring the horrors of that tradegy to life. In his first book Night, Mr. Wiesel describes his terrifying experiences as a young boy in Auschwitz and Buchenwald, where his parents and younger sister died at the hands of the Nazis. After Night, he wrote a number of other books on this dark period in which the world stood by and watched in silence as Nazi soldiers wantonly murdered 6 million Jews. Through his writing we feel the pain and suffering of the victims of the Holocaust and we realize that the horrors of this episode—the deportation trains, the death camps, the bigotry and intolerance—must never be repeated.

As author, lecturer and Chairman of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, Elie Wiesel has waged a persistent and dedicated campaign to educate people about the Holocaust and to establish a permanent and living memorial in the United States to those who perished in this heinous episode. That memorial will take the form of a museum and education center to be housed in Washington at a site near the National Mall. It will serve as a constant reminder that the United States as a national must never again waver, as we did during the Holocaust, in our commitment to the principles of liberty and equality for all human beings.

Besides being recognized as a humanitarian and human rights activist, Elie Wiesel is also well known as a prolific and talented author, whose works cover a broad spectrum of subjects related to Judaism and the Bible. He has received numerous literary awards including the Jewish Heritage Award for Literature and the National Jewish Book Council Awards.

I have had the pleasure of serving with Elie Wiesel on both the President's Commission on the Holocaust, established by President Carter in 1978, and the Holocaust Memorial Council. Over the years, I have been continually impressed by Elie's dedication and unwavering commitment. As we approach the 1984 days of remembrance for victims of the Holocaust, it is fitting and proper that we honor Elie Wiesel, a survivor of that tragedy who has a goal that we all share: to prevent future generations from experiencing the atrocities of a holocaust.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

LANDS IN TRUST FOR THE MAKAH INDIAN TRIBE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 3376) to declare that the United States holds certain lands in trust for the Makah Indian Tribe, Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate has acted today on H.R. 3376, a companion bill to S. 2468; a bill I introduced to transfer in trust to the U.S. Tatoosh and Waadah Islands for the benefit of the Makah Indian Tribe. These islands are located off the coast of Makah Indian Reservation on Washington's Olympic Peninsula.

These islands are small, comprising less than 80 acres, and of no significant commercial value to the United States. They are, however, of great cultural, historical, and religious importance to the Makah people.

These islands were taken from the Makah Tribe by a treaty negotiated in 1855. None of the tribal members who participated in the treaty negotiations, however, could read or write English. Their understanding of the treaty terms was dependent on the oral explanations of the U.S. treaty commissioners. The records of the treaty proceedings clearly indicate that the cession of Tatoosh and Waadah Islands never was discussed. The Makahs have maintained ever since that they never intended to give up these islands. This bill will restore Tatoosh and Waadah to tribal ownership.

I was concerned about public access to these islands if this bill became law. I am pleased that the Makah Tribal Council has passed a resolution which declares that the "Makah Tribe will extend its traditional hospitality to visitors and nonmembers who may desire to visit these islands."

The bill reserves to the Coast Guard the right to continue to use these islands for aids to navigation. It also states that the bill will not enlarge, impair, or affect any existing fishing right of the Makah Tribe.

I urge President Reagan to right a historical wrong by signing this bill into law.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DECLARING CERTAIN LANDS AS PART OF THE ALLEGANY RESERVATION

The bill (H.R. 3555) to declare certain lands held by the Seneca Nation of Indians to be part of the Allegany Reservation in the State of New York, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider en bloc the votes by which the various measures were passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

LONGSHOREMEN'S AND HARBOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 38.

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate (S. 38) entitled "Entitled the 'Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act' ", do pass with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"(ii) has knowingly and willfully submitted, or caused to be submitted, a bill or request for payment under this Act containing a charge which the Secretary finds to be substantially in excess of the charge for the service, appliance, or supply prevailing within the community, unless the Secretary finds there is good cause for the bill or request containing the charge;

An employee may not change physicians after his initial choice unless the employer, carrier, or deputy commissioner has given prior consent for such change. Such consent shall be given in cases where an employee's initial choice was not of a specialist whose services are necessary for and appropriate to the proper care and treatment of the compensable injury or disease. In all other cases, consent may be given upon a showing of good cause for change.".

(b) Section 7(d) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) An employee shall not be entitled to recover any amount expended by him for medical or other treatment or services unless he shall have complied with subsections (b) and (c) and the applicable regulations or unless the employer shall have refused or neglected to furnish such services, or unless the nature of the injury required such treatment and services and the employer or his superintendent or foreman having knowledge of such injury shall have neglected to provide or authorize same; nor shall any claim for medical or surgical treatment be valid and enforceable against such employer, unless within twenty-one days following the first treatment the physician giving such treatment furnishes to the employer and the deputy commissioner a report of such injury or treatment, on a form prescribed by the Secretary. The Secretary may, upon application by a party in interest, make an award for the reasonable value of such medical or surgical treatment so obtained by the employee. If at any time the employee unreasonably refuses to submit to medical or surgical treatment, or to an examination by a physician selected by the employer, the Secretary or administrative law judge may, by order, suspend the payment of further compensation during such time as such refusal continues, and no compensation shall be paid at any time during the period of such suspension, unless the circumstances justified the refusal.".

(c) Section 7 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(j)(1) The Secretary shall have the authority to make rules and regulations and to establish procedures, not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, which are necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of subsection (c), including the nature and extent of the proof and evidence necessary for actions under this section and the methods of taking and furnishing such proof and evidence.

The Secretary shall provide notice of these findings and an opportunity for a hearing pursuant to section 556 of title 5, United States Code, for a provider who would be affected by a decision under this section. A request for a hearing must be filed with the Secretary within thirty days after notice of the findings is received by the provider making such request. If a hearing is held, the Secretary shall, on the basis of evidence adduced at the hearing, affirm, modify, or reverse the findings of fact and proposed action under this section.

"(3) For the purpose of any hearing, investigation, or other proceeding authorized or directed under this section, the provisions of section 9 and 10 (relating to the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. 49, 50) shall apply to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Secretary or any officer designated by him.

"(4) any physician or health care provider, after any final decision of the Secretary made after a hearing to which he was a party, irrespective of the amount in controversy, may obtain a review of such decision by a civil action commenced within sixty days after the mailing to him of notice of such decision. Such action shall be brought in the court of appeals of the United States for the judicial circuit in which the plaintiff resides or has his principal place of business, or the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. As part of his answer, the Secretary shall file a certified copy of the transcript of the record of the hearing, including all evidence submitted in connection therewith. The findings of fact of the Secretary, if based on substantial evidence in the record as a whole, shall be conclusive.".

"(k)(1) Nothing in this Act prevents an employee whose injury or disability has been established under this Act from relying in good faith on treatment by prayer or spiritual means alone, in accordance with the tenets and practice of a recognized church or religious denomination, by an accredited practitioner of such recognized church or religious denomination, and on nursing services rendered in accordance with such tenets and practice, without suffering loss or diminution of the compensation benefits under this Act. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to except an employee from all physical examinations required by this Act.

"(2) If an employee refuses to submit to medical or surgical services solely because, in adherence to the tenets and practice of a recognized church or religious denomination, the employee relies upon prayer or spiritual means alone for healing, such employee shall not be considered to have unreasonably refused medical or surgical treatment under subsection (d) or to have unreasonably refused to undergo physical rehabilitation.".

COMPENSATION FOR DISABILITY

SEC. 7. (a) Section 8(a) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Permanent total disability: In the case of total disability determined to be permanent, 66⅔ per centum of the average weekly wages of the employee shall be paid to the employee during the continuance of the disability. Loss of both hands, both arms, both feet, both legs, both eyes, or any combination of two such body parts, shall constitute permanent total disability in the absence of conclusive proof to the contrary. In all other cases, permanent total disability shall be determined in accordance with the facts.".

(b) Section 8(c)(13) is amended to read as follows:

"(13) Loss of hearing:

"(A) Compensation for loss of hearing in one ear, fifty-two weeks.

"(B) Compensation for loss of hearing in both ears, two-hundred weeks.

"(C)(i) An audiogram shall be presumptive evidence of the amount of hearing loss sustained as of the date thereof, only if (I) such audiogram was administered by a licensed or certified audiologist or a physician who is certified in otolaryngology, (II) such audiogram, with the report thereon, was provided to the employee at the time it was administered, and (III) no contrary audiogram made at that time is produced.

"(ii) The time for filing a notice of injury, under section 12 of this Act, or a claim for compensation, under section 13 of this Act, shall not begin to run in connection with any claim for loss of hearing under this section, until the employee has been provided with an audiogram, with the accompanying report thereon, which indicates that the employee has suffered a loss of hearing.

"(D) Within ninety days of the date of enactment of the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act Amendments of 1983, the Secretary shall promulgate regulations to define the term 'loss of hearing' in accordance with the American Medical Association Guides for the Evaluation of Permanent Impairment.".

(c) Section 8(c)(20) is amended by striking out "$3,500" and inserting in lieu thereof "$7,500".

(d) Section 8(c)(21) is amended to read as follows:

Failure of the employer to provide a copy of such request for apportionment shall be an absolute defense to the special fund's liability for the payment of any benefits in connection with such claim, if the Secretary denies the liability of the special fund in connection with such claim. Failure to notify the Secretary pursuant to this paragraph shall not be a bar to subsequent apportionment of liability to the special fund if the Secretary determines that the employer could not have reasonably anticipated the liability of the special fund.".

"(i)(1) Whenever the parties to any claim for compensation, including survivors benefits, under this Act agree to a settlement, the deputy commissioner or administrative law judge shall approve the settlement within thirty days unless it is found to be inadequate or procured by duress. If the parties to the settlement are represented by counsel, then agreements shall be deemed approved unless specifically disapproved within thirty days after submission for approval.

"(2) If the deputy commissioner disapproves an application for settlement under paragraph (1), the deputy commissioner shall issue a written statement within thirty days containing the reasons for disapproval. Any party to the settlement may request a hearing before an administrative law judge in the manner prescribed by this Act. Following such hearing, the administrative law judge shall enter an order approving or rejecting the settlement.

"(3) A settlement approved under this section shall discharge the liability of the employer, carrier, or both. Settlements may be agreed upon at any stage of the proceeding including after entry of a final compensation order.".

(h) Section 8 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

AUTHORIZATION FOR TESTIMONY, DOCUMENTS, AND FOR SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL TO ASSIST IN DEFENSE OF CERTAIN CASES

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk in behalf of Senator BAKER and Senator BYRD and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate resolution (S. Res. 374) authorizing the testimony and production of documents and directing the Senate legal counsel to assist in the defense of Republicbank, Lubbock, and so forth, et al., vs. United States of America, and The Travelers Insurance Corp. vs. United States.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the cases of Republicbank, Lubbock, etc., et al. against United States of America and the Travelers Insurance Corp. against United States of America are pending in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Texas, Lubbock Division. The Department of Justice is defending these cases which were filed under the provisions of the Federal Tort Claims Act, and which involve claims for property damages allegedly sustained from a fire which occurred in a Lubbock office building in which Senator TOWER had a State office. The testimony of Thomas J. Fahey, an employee in Senator TOWER's office, and the production of certain documents have been requested in the cases. Testimony of other present and former members of the staff may also be needed for the trial.

In addition, the U.S. attorney has requested the assistance of the Senate legal counsel in the preparation and trial of these cases. In view of the fact that this litigation directly involves a Senate office, it is appropriate that full cooperation be provided in defending these claims. This resolution would authorize the requested testimony and documents and direct the Senate legal counsel to assist in the defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The Resolution (S. Res. 374), with its preamble, reads as follows:

Whereas, the parties have requested the production of certain documents and the testimony of Thomas J. Fahey, an employee of Senator Tower's office in these cases;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that testimony, documents, papers, and records under the control of or in the possession of the Senate are needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of the Senate;

Whereas, the United States Attorney has requested the assistance of the Office of Senate Legal Counsel in the preparation and defense of these cases;

Whereas, pursuant to section 708(c) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. 288g(c) (1982), the Senate may direct its Counsel to perform such duties consistent with Title VII of the Ethics in Government Act as the Senate may direct: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Thomas J. Fahey and such other present and former members of Senator Tower's staff as may be needed are authorized to appear and testify and to produce documents in the cases of Republicbank, Lubbock, etc., et al. v. United States of America, and The Travelers Insurance Corp. v. United States of America, except concerning matters for which a privilege from disclosure should be asserted;

2. That the Senate Legal Counsel is authorized and directed to assist the United States Attorney in the defense of the cases of Republicbank, Lubbock, etc., et al. v. United States of America, and The Travelers Insurance Corp. v. United States of America.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask my good friend from West Virginia if it would meet with his approval for me to request that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nominations on the Executive Calendar beginning with the Department of Education, and including all of the nominations on page 2 and page 3 and the first three items placed on the Secretary's desk.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection on this side.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session for the purpose of considering the items I have mentioned on the Executive Calendar.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be stated.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Louis Roman Disabato, of Texas, to be a member of the National Museum Services Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination is considered and confirmed.

FEDERAL COUNCIL ON THE AGING

The legislative clerk read the nominations of Ingrid Azvedo, of California; Nelda Ann Lambert Barton, of Kentucky; Edna Bogosian, of Massachusetts; James N. Broder, of Maine; Tony Guglielmo, of Connecticut; and Frances Lamont, of South Dakota, to be members of the Federal Council on the Aging.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I wish to express my strong support for the reappointment of James N. Broder, of Portland, Maine, as a member of the Council on Aging.

Over the course of the past decade, the work of the Council has been instrumental in making both the Government and the American people more aware of the special needs of our older population, and more aware of the shortcomings that exist in programs and policies designed to serve them.

An ongoing demographic change in our Nation, now becoming known as the greying of America, will present a challenge to our society by the end of this century which will be as vast in scope as the challenge of absorbing the millions of migrants who flooded our shores at the beginning of this century.

The Council on Aging bears the primary responsibility of focusing on the implications of that demographic change, and it has the unique responsibility within the Federal Government of informing the President, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, and the Congress of the policy changes that must be made to respond to that change.

Those responsibilities will be heavier in the coming years, and I cannot think of an individual whose special expertise and experience will bring more to the Council than Jamie Broder.

The Council on Aging has educated the Congress and the executive branch to the needs of older people. It has helped us understand that the human need for independence and dignity is as crucial to older people as to the most youthful. Jamie Broder has taken that understanding and is applying it to the practial problems of how we can provide adequate and economical shelter for our older people without robbing them of their self-respect and independence.

Jamie's expertise in one of the most difficult and pressing areas of need for the elderly—shelter—is nationally recognized.

He was personally involved in drafting the landmark legislation that established the principle of shelter designed for the elderly which respects their psychic as well as their physical needs. That program, the section 202 housing program for the elderly, has served thousands of Maine's elderly and hundreds of thousands nationally. It is a prototype of the imaginative and practical thinking that our society will need more and more as our population ages.

Today, Jamie is actively working with Maine's State Bureau of the Elderly to establish the home equity conversion project, a program whose purpose is to give older homeowners the opportunity to remain in their communities by using the equity from their homes as a source of income. It is hard to overstate how important it is in the small rural communities typical of Maine to give older people that opportunity.

The work of the Federal Council on Aging has helped us to recognize that the universal experience of growing old need not be a fearful one. Jamie Broder's contribution to that work, both in his service on the Council and in his civic activities in Maine, has been great in the past and I am confident it will be invaluable in the future.

This is a nomination which merits the unanimous support of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James H. Webb, Jr., of Virginia, to be an Assistant Secretary of Defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination is considered and confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Thomas H. Anderson, Jr., of Mississippi, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Barbados, and to serve concurrently and without additional compensation as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Commonwealth of Dominica, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to St. Lucia, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Antigua and Barbuda, and Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to St. Christopher; and the nomination of Harry E. Bergold, Jr., of Florida, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Nicaragua.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed.

NOMINATIONS PLACED ON THE SECRETARY'S DESK IN THE AIR FORCE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be stated.

The legislative clerk read various nominations placed on the Secretary's desk in the Air Force.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nominations were considered and confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CENTRAL AMERICA AND U.S. FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, the last few weeks have seen an extraordinary amount of attention paid to events in Central America, and to the role which our country has played in those events. For instance, shortly before the March 6 elections in El Salvador, many of us heard from a high-ranking officer in the Salvadoran military concerning the links between death squad activities and the Salvadoran political system.

On March 8, we were treated to the spectacle of the administration seeking to load a significant appropriation onto the African famine relief bill, bypassing in the process both the Foreign Relations Committee and the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Still later, and continuing into April, the Senate undertook 11 separate rollcall votes on the appropriations request which had emerged from a careful and bipartisan consideration of our policy in Central America. On all 11 votes, a majority—frequently an overwhelming bipartisan majority—voted to stay with the package which had been so carefully worked out by Senators INOUYE and KASTEN.

Yet only 1 day after this demonstration of bipartisanship within the Senate and cooperation between the Senate and the Executive, the President was at Georgetown University calling upon us to restore bipartisanship in our foreign policy, and to support "the practical details of policy, not just the general goals."

Finally, a scant 3 days after the President's speech, we in the Congress awoke to news stories which specified the role played by the American Government in the mining of Nicaraguan harbors. As Senator GOLDWATER made clear in his now-famous letter to the Director of Central Intelligence, the Congress had not been fully and appropriately briefed on this activity via the channels of the Senate Intelligence Committee. It was therefore not surprising that the Senate adopted, by an overwhelming vote, a resolution calling for the immediate termination of the mining.

The proverbial "man from Mars," visiting this city for the first time and knowing nothing of our customs, would be hard pressed to make sense of these events. So too would the American public. The question that is being asked, as we resume our legislative session, is "what next in Central America?"

Before we can answer that question, we have to ask ourselves "where have we been?"

POLICY AND PROCESS IN FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. President, the reason our actions here in Washington look so confusing is that we are dealing with two separate issues when we debate Central America. The first issue—a perennial in Washington—has to do with the procedures by which foreign policy is made. It touches on such questions as the proper role of Congress in foreign policy, the wisdom of our annual appropriations process, and the necessary tension between a policy that is always consistent enough to be understandable and flexible enough to be realistic.

The second issue, which is sometimes overlooked, is just where we hope to go in our overall Central America policy. When I say that this issue is often overlooked, I mean that we frequently get so bound up in the day-to-day details of ongoing events, or so enamoured of the latest aphorisms to emerge from the critics and proponents of policy alike, that we ignore the forest for the trees.

Both issues are related, and it would be a very naive person who could suggest that policy and process are distinct entities, just as it would be a very naive person who would suggest that there is a large distinction between politics and policy. But even recognizing the necessary overlap between procedures and goals, it can be worthwhile periodically to recognize that they often pose separate questions and challenges to this country as it charts its course in international waters.

The issues with which we dealt throughout March and much of April nominally bore on our policy in Central America. But the actions we took were very distinct, because we were alternately dealing with procedural and policy questions.

I don't want to suggest that this is a desirable state of affairs. It isn't. We cannot hope to develop an integrated and comprehensive policy for Central America until we reintegrate our policy debate with some common understandings about procedures and process. But we will not achieve that state unless we first recognize that our current impasse derives from an inadequate set of procedural understandings and a total failure to elaborate the long-term goals against which our daily actions in Central America can be measured.

So what I am proposing, Mr. President, is that we first get our house in order by artificially separating for the moment the question of policy from the question of process. When we recognize the limitations in each, we can correct them. When in turn they are corrected, we can reintegrate them and get on with the business of foreign relations. Perhaps the best way to do this is to carefully study just what happened in the dizzying couple of weeks I touched upon at the outset of my statement.

THE URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL

From March 29 through April 5, the Senate conducted an intense debate on the urgent supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1984. In most respects, the intensity of this debate was no surprise, for the issue involved was Central America and the manner in which the bill first arose—a failed attempt by the President to make an end run around the authorizing committees and to tag his request onto a bill which we all knew could not be delayed—was guaranteed to arouse controversy.

In some respects, however, it is genuinely surprising that we should have devoted so much time to this matter, for the fact is that when we last appropriated funds for Central America we knew full well that the administration would be back this spring looking for more. We knew this because we guaranteed it by reducing the fiscal year 1984 authorization to levels well below what the administration had felt was prudent.

In other words, Mr. President, the real issue in the debate this spring was not over our policy in Central America. We had had that debate last fall. The issue instead was over the relatively trivial point of whether an additional short-term infusion of funds would be granted to carry out a program on which we had signed off last fall.

To draw a simplistic analogy, Mr. President, it was as if somebody had made the decision to purchase a car, and having arranged for consumer credit, to then debate whether or not to make his monthly payment on time and in the amount which his budget could stand. The debate was not over whether to sell the car, or to rely on public transportation, or to purchase a second and better car. The debate was simply over whether to meet an obligation which had been clearly understood from the outset, despite the fact that circumstances had not substantially changed.

Keep in mind, Mr. President, that the supplemental appropriation was carefully crafted by a bipartisan team, led by Senators INOUYE and KASTEN. It cut the President's initial request by one-third. It imposed limits. It was explicitly not an open-ended commitment. It was a short-term infusion of funds, designed to carry us through a period in which the glimmerings of a genuine policy are becoming vaguely apparent.

Two years ago, this country moved the Government of El Salvador in the general direction of elections. The first round of the Presidential elections was conducted in early March of this year. The second round will be conducted in May. To have cut off this process before it was even begun—for instance by killing funding for the paramilitary program which helps to preserve the lives of voters by making it harder for rebels armed by and directed from Nicaragua to fight—would simply have been folly. And to cast the vote on this question as a vote on policy is really begging the question, for the fact—as I intend to argue at length later—is that we do not yet have a genuine policy.

Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that on all separate rollcall votes, the Senate stayed with the appropriations bill by large majorities, frequently by margins greater than 3 to 1. There were few here who believed that it was appropriate to treat a short-term appropriations bill as the vehicle to alter or formulate policy. As my friend, the junior Senator from Connecticut, stated in an exchange with me, the urgent supplemental appropriations bill was "hardly the kind of vehicle we ought to be using, this catchall we have every time we want to move something along." Senator DODD went on to say "my hope is that we might have an opportunity and a better forum for these kinds of policy discussions." I agree heartily.

That brings me to the next point—the remarkable and astonishing comments by the President in his Georgetown University speech, a speech which followed by 1 day the adoption—on a vote of 76 to 19—of the appropriations bill which underwrote his programs.

Perhaps it is a matter of proximity, Mr. President. I think I understand why people in the Senate might have viewed this bill as an occasion for a debate on policy, particularly given how poorly the administration had made its case when it tried to resort to the end run of March 8. But, for the life of me, I cannot understand how the President had this body in mind—if he did—when he gave his speech.

THE GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY SPEECH AND CONGRESSIONAL PROCEDURES

Mr. President, the tension between the Executive and the legislature in foreign policy is as old as the Republic. It was Thomas Jefferson who believed so strenuously in congressional primacy over the war powers, but it was President Jefferson who ignored Congress when he sent naval expeditions to the Barbary Coast.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution is explicit on the question of congressional powers. So to argue that Congress is a nuisance or worse in the area of foreign policy is no argument at all. If Congress is a nuisance—and it frequently is—it is a necessary nuisance.

This is more than just civics book proprieties. The proper and necessary role of Congress is to act as a sort of board of directors, which mediates between the people and their President on matters of significant policy. We have learned too often that a foreign policy which is not supported by the people of this country is a foreign policy which will eventually fail. All the technology, or money, or keen analysis in the world cannot change this fact. So the best way to guarantee that a policy has support—and to pick up early warnings if it does not—is to rely on the Congress. A failure to do so is more than improper; it is stupid as well.

This does not mean that Congress is necessarily right. It does not mean that Congress is capable of running policy effectively. As the President properly noted in his Georgetown speech:

> Congress has not yet developed capacities for coherent, responsible action to carry out the new foreign policy powers it has taken for itself.

But, with all its failings—institutional, political, intellectual, and emotional—the Congress still remains at the center of our foreign policy process. If we are to correct the flaws which currently make sound policy so difficult to implement, we must begin by asking Congress to live up to its responsibilities, not to abrogate them.

It does not stretch the imagination too much to argue that this President, like all his predecessors, would probably sleep better if the only role we played in foreign policy was cheerleader. When the President spoke of the need for "restoring bipartisanship" and of his hopes that Congress would support "the practical details of policy, not just the general goals," he was to some extent using code words to ask us to be his cheerleader.

Too often, Mr. President, we assume that the fundamental failing in our foreign policy derives exclusively from partisanship. As a result we look back to the few years in our era—shortly after World War II when Senator Vandenberg led his wing of the Republican Party out of isolationism and into strong support for Harry Truman's policies in Europe—as the golden age of American foreign policy. In extreme cases, we come to think of that era as the rule, not the exception.

There is absolutely no doubt in my mind that a foreign policy which enjoys bipartisan support is better than one that does not. But that goal cannot be cited as its own justification. It has to be worked for, hard, every day. If a policy is to be bipartisan, a broad spectrum of people must be convinced that the policy is worthwhile, at least in its general goals and preferably in its practical details. The act of convincing people has to be based on more than simply a presumptive claim to expertise, on more than simply an emotional appeal for deference to authority. It has to be based on a sound and well elaborated case. And frequently, it has to be based on give and take. Bipartisanship is a compromise, not a call to regimentation.

President Reagan himself understands the limits upon a bipartisan foreign policy when that policy is controversial. As he made clear in his opposition to the SALT II accord and the Panama Canal Treaty—agreements which were first negotiated by President Ford and later culminated by President Carter—bipartisanship is earned through hard work; it is not automatically conferred.

What is ironic in the Georgetown speech, therefore, is that it overlooks three crucial points.

First, it overlooks the fact that bipartisanship is a worthy goal which is observed more in the breach than not.

Second, it overlooks the fact that this Congress has largely supported the President's initiatives and has done so on a bipartisan basis. Despite all we read about the Republican-controlled Senate. The fact remains that congressional support for such things as construction of the MX missile; acceleration of defense spending; deployment of troops to Lebanon; the conduct of the arms talks; and the ongoing paramilitary program in Central America has occurred in both Houses, and has involved members of both parties. It was Senator INOUYE who steered the supplemental appropriations through Congress a few weeks ago. It was Speaker O'NEILL whose support was crucial to passage of the war powers resolution concerning Lebanon. It has been bipartisanship, in both Houses, which has underwritten this President's remarkable string of foreign policy victories.

Finally, the speech overlooks a third and crucial point. When the President expresses his understandable frustration with the limitations on the congressional ability to shape, oversee, and support policy, he is not speaking about bipartisanship at all. Instead, he is talking about frictions and tensions which are built into the Congress as a body and into exective-congressional relations generically, regardless of party alinements.

As I noted earlier, there are some distinct limitations on the congressional ability to perform its proper role in foreign policy. But these limitations are as much institutional as they are political. And they must be overcome if we are to avoid policy paralysis.

For instance, as I argued when I introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 97 along with Senators INOUYE and KASSEBAUM, Congress is far too reluctant to live up to its own responsibilities when those responsibilities entail making tough decisions and living with them. We are far too prone to dump everything in the President's lap, and then to act offended when he acts as we asked him to. We are far too prone to abrogate a policy-setting role—a role we must share with the President—and to adopt instead a micromanagement role. In that sense, the President's comments concerning the "practical details of policy" are somewhat understandable.

What is called for, if we are to act in a responsible way as a board of directors, is the ability to look at a large issue, recognize the tradeoffs and nuances, develop a sense of direction, and then entrust implementation to the proper authority. Too often, instead, we focus on the small issue or the current symbol; we avoid nuance; and we adopt a skeptical and critical attitude toward the details, not recognizing that when we fail to specify goals then we will necessarily be upset about derivative details.

So I agree with the President that Congress needs to improve its mechanisms for dealing with policy. And I want to reiterate that when we do our job, it will be a shared task. That is why it is so critical that there be regular and complete consultation between the Executive and Congress. Without consultation—and the trust that comes from consultation—there can be no hope for bipartisanship, nor for a Congress willing to recognize its own limits as well as its responsibilities, and to behave accordingly. This brings us, of course, to the issue of the mining of Nicaraguan waters.

MINING AND THE PARAMILITARY PROGRAM

Mr. President, the Congress generally, and the House and Senate Intelligence Committees particularly, have made amply clear their willingness to sustain a program of paramilitary action in Central America if that program is sensible; if it is bounded rather than open ended; if it is explained to the proper authorities rather than concealed; and if it is a clear and needed element of a larger policy.

Unfortunately, we have often lost sight of the reason why the United States looks to this option in its foreign policy. In generally, such programs are designed to provide us measures short of open hostilities to achieve aims which cannot be achieved diplomatically. In the case of Nicaragua, a country which has made abundantly clear its desire to feed the insurgency in El Salvador and export its own form of government by mob to Costa Rica, it has been a sensible idea to impose a cost on such actions. What this calls for, obviously, is limited and finite activities, not large-scale measures. Ideally, it would be beneficial if everybody who smuggled arms from Nicaragua into other countries, or who undertook terrorist bombings in Costa Rica, could be caught and detained.

Failing that, it is altogether sensible to impose a cost on those who get through, both to slow down the spread of subversion in what Nicaragua calls a "revolution without frontiers" and to deter future such actions.

Consistently, the Intelligence Committees have sought to provide guidance to the appropriate authorities in order to insure that what actions might be taken are within sensible and legal bounds. The reason that the Congress has thus far authorized the funding sought is that individual Members of Congress have been able to trust the judgment and the ability of their colleagues on the Senate and House Intelligence Committees. Rather than asking each Member of Congress to investigate what are necessarily highly sensitive matters, the Congress has entrusted that job to small committees.

If the administration—any administration—is to hope for continued congressional authority to conduct the kinds of programs which must occasionally be undertaken, it is vital that there be the greatest possible degree of consultation between the Executive and the appropriate congressional committees. As Senator GOLDWATER put it in his letter to Director Casey of the CIA, we cannot be expected to support a policy when we ourselves do not know what that policy is.

In short, if the Intelligence Committees are to do their job, they must have a reputation among their colleagues for reliability. They cannot have that reputation if vital information is kept from them. And if they should ultimately lose their effectiveness because their reputation has declined, the alternative will be a return to the days when up to eight separate committees oversaw the actions of the intelligence community. Under such circumstances, we will not ever have a policy; we will have a circus.

When the President stated in his Georgetown speech that the administration has tried to "seek new means to reach bipartisan, executive, legislative consensus," I was somewhat curious just what he meant. Keep in mind that these comments were delivered on Friday, April 6.

By Monday, April 9, I simply could not believe that assertion, for I had read—along with all of my colleagues—the details of our involvement in the mining of Nicaraguan waters. There had been no consensus on this issue because there had been no consultation. And, frankly, had there been consultation, there would not have been consensus for the action was foolish in the extreme. It posed a distinct risk of escalating our difficulties with Nicaragua; it involved other countries; and it self-evidently had no hope for secrecy. Worst of all, the subsequent treatment of the controversy demonstrated an incredible insensitivity to reality, and it succeeded in diverting attention from the behavior of the Sandinistas to our own behavior. That is why, of course, there was so lopsided a vote to prohibit future mining.

What this episode demonstrates, Mr. President, is that Congress—with all its cumbersome procedures—can serve as a valuable check on stupidity. It shows, in other words, that procedure can bolster policy. The astonishing failure of the administration to understand the special burdens borne by the House and Senate Intelligence Committees is perhaps the least of the issues involved here, bad as they were. Here was a case where a failure to adhere to procedure led to a policy decision which was disastrous. And that brings us back to the beginning—the need to integrate policy with procedure.

Obviously, the vote against the behavior of the administration did not represent a repudiation of the policy which we had sustained and supported the previous week. In the first place, we adopted a nonbinding resolution. In the second place, few of us agreed that mining harbors was consonant with either the overall policy interests of the United States in Central America or with the paramilitary program in particular. So in voting as we did, we did not undercut our policy, we reaffirmed it. Finally, we were rightly disturbed that there had been such a flagrant abuse of procedure.

So in some senses, the 84-to-12 vote on the Kennedy resolution was a matter of politics inside the Washington Beltway, not policy at the water's edge. But as a clear signal of the need to conform our policy to proper procedure, the vote spoke legions about the overall failings of U.S. policy in Central America.

We can learn from this episode, Mr. President, and we can use the lessons gained to develop the kind of foreign policy which I know that President Reagan wants to see us adopt in Central America. The first lesson we must learn, of course, is that procedure is a vital element of sound policy, not an impediment to it. And I think we are learning that lesson now, both here in Congress and in the Executive.

Over the past few days, we have begun—at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue—to move toward recommitting ourselves to full and active consultation and participation in the shared duties of foreign policy. Pledges have been made, and misunderstandings have been cleared up. I am confident that we will not see a repetition of the mining fiasco.

But structural reforms are not enough. We cannot just ink in lines of communication on an organization chart and expect to establish the kind of working relationship needed to actually formulate and implement policy. As I mentioned earlier, bipartisanship—which is really a form of trust—has to be earned.

It is not earned when the Secretary of State reiterates the foolish statement that a lack of bipartisanship is what undermined our approach to Lebanon. If people in the administration really believe this point, then they have not read the conclusions of their own Commission of Inquiry, chaired by Admiral Long, and they have forgotten that even as orders were being prepared to load our marines on ships administration spokesmen were attacking anybody in Congress who suggested this alternative.

Bipartisanship is not earned when things like the Georgetown speech follows by 1 day a manifest demonstration of bipartisanship in the Senate of the United States.

Bipartisanship is not earned when the administration apparently views the Intelligence Committees as obstacles, rather than as partners in the tough job of making and implementing policy.

Unless we start seeing a genuine interest in sharing with Congress—both Houses and both parties—the responsibility for crafting our policy in Central America, we will lose any prospect of a policy at all. We already face the threat that the House may cut off the CIA supplemental funding which this body appropriated on April 5. Speaking as a member of the Intelligence Committee, as a person with years of experience in Central America, and as a Republican Senator, I know that this would be a tragic mistake—a point made with some clarity in a recent edition of the New Republic. But if it were to happen, the fault would lie as much with the administration as with the House. So here is one Republican Senator who will make the case that his own party's interest as much as the Nation's interest is served when the President makes better overtures for bipartisanship than he did at Georgetown.

THE CHALLENGE IN CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. President, if we in Congress have the courage and the will to tackle so challenging and complex an issue—particularly in an election year—we have an impending opportunity to help elaborate a policy for Central America, to live up to our own responsibilities, to benefit this country we serve. That opportunity, of course, will be found in the debate—if we have one—over the Jackson plan.

It is often said that we function too often here by continuing resolution—the force feeding of money into programs which have not been well studied. That is nowhere more the case than in our policy toward Central America.

Every year since I have been here, we have gone through occasional debates over particular issues—human rights; land reform; trade relations. We have usually done so on a bilateral basis, and with little real scrutiny of our underlying assumptions about how countries evolve. A debate over the future of a region has too often become a trivia contest over a given country's past. We have seldom, if ever, enunciated what goals we want to accomplish, and we have never determined whether Central America is a distinct region. A cockpit for United States-Soviet relations, or a spot on the map where seven countries happen to be found.

We have not been alone in this failing, of course. Time after time, in listening to administration testimony, I get the sense that our policy is determined simply by whomever has a microphone on a given day, and by whatever minicrisis occurred the day before. We are still coming to grips with this complex region, Mr. President. Because of that, it is simply not correct to say that we have a policy. Instead, it can be said at best that we have a series of programs, which seem to change with the winds.

In the next few weeks, Central America is about to undergo the starts of what could be a profound change. El Salvador and Honduras will both hold elections. These elections may well result in genuinely representative governments which can evolved over time into full-fledged democracies provided we and they are constant in our purpose. This will then leave Guatemala at one extreme and Nicaragua at another. And it will bolster the Contadora peace process, provided the U.S. is willing to follow the advice of such authorities as President Monge of Costa Rica.

In short, Mr. President, we may soon be able to benefit from the advice and expertise of committed democrats in as many as four countries in the region—Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras, and Panama. If we ourselves can overcome our own prejudices and learn from this unique configuration, I am confident that we can begin to put some flesh on the skeletonized policy outlined by the Kissinger Commission.

Mr. President, this is not the place to outline the details of the Jackson plan, with which all of us are familiar anyway. Suffice it to say that the report is remarkable in its subtlety, in its grasp of the complexity of the situation, in its avoidance of bumper-sticker nostrums, and in the degree to which it has been misrepresented, misunderstood, and ignored by so many Americans. As a recent article in the National Journal makes clear, the report of the Bipartisan Commission, like the works of Shakespeare or the Bible, is more quoted than read.

Mr. President, I am confident that the Jackson plan represents a significant outline which, with modification by the Congress, can begin to shape our long-term policy. It can account for the complex interrelationships among countries in the region. It can account for the urgency of the crisis which has been so long in the making and so long ignored. It can account for the fact that, like it or not, the United States will always be involved in the region even if by default. What will be needed, Mr. President, is a willingness by this body, and by our colleagues in the House, to sit down and actually think this through.

So to conclude, Mr. President, we need to begin now to ask some fundamental questions. Each of us will have different answers, of course, but we need a set of common questions. Let me pose a few of them:

First, will the administration be willing to replace its current hodgepodge of programs with a clear statement of what we are doing?

Second, will the President and his officers begin to demonstrate a genuine willingness to work with Congress, and not against it?

Third, will we in Congress begin, as the Nation's board of directors, to enunciate a vision of the future, recognizing that the United States must play major role in that future?

Fourth, will we in both branches of Government begin to work together to give some specifics to that vision, altering it where needed and deferring to each other's particular form of expertise where appropriate?

Fifth, will we take advantage of the great pool of talent which can be found among people like President Monge or former President Duarte?

Finally, will we come to recognize that just as our policy must be long term, so too the congressional sense of responsibility for actually shaping and sharing policy must be long term?

Unless these questions are answered in the affirmative, I fear that we will continue to see our current pattern of vacillation between procedural and policy questions.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the articles from the National Journal and the New Republic, to which I have referred, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the National Journal, Apr. 21, 1984]

WHATEVER HAPPENED TO THE KISSINGER PANEL'S CENTRAL AMERICA CONSENSUS?

(By Christopher Madison)

Last summer, President Reagan appointed a bipartisan commission to help build public support for his Central America policies, which were causing increasing controversy. The 12-member commission finished its work in January and, apparently overcoming many preconceptions about the issues, forged a consensus. But that consensus has not been extended to Congress or the American public.

Instead, in the months since the report's release, as during the previous year, Reagan has been engaged in constant battle with Congress over his Central America policies. Sometimes he wins; Congress has never succeeded in cutting off aid to El Salvador. But the Administration's policy toward Nicaragua has always generated controversy, and may make consensus impossible.

Early this month, for example, the Senate seemed to be leaning in Reagan's direction when it overwhelmingly approved his $62 million aid request for El Salvador and a $21 million authorization to support the antigovernment rebels in Nicaragua.

The very next week, outraged by disclosures that the Central Intelligence Agency had a direct role in supervising the mining of Nicaraguan harbors, the Senate approved a "sense-of-the-Senate" resolution condemning the CIA's role. The House quickly approved a similar resolution by a 281-111 vote, and seemed certain to vote down further funds for the Nicaraguan effort and to scale back the Salvadoran aid request.

Far in the background in these debates, and having almost no obvious influence, it seems, is the report of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America, chaired by former Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger. The lack of impact has left some members frustrated and depressed. Others believe it was unrealistic to expect a commission report to end the Central American debate, particularly in an election year when Democrats need issues on which to challenge Reagan at the polls.

The 12-member commission, appointed by Reagan last year at the first stirrings of controversy over his policies, was asked to make policy recommendations and to suggest how a consensus might be achieved. It undertook an exhaustive review of political, social and economic conditions in the region and took clear stands on most of the issues—but not all—now being debated by Congress.

In its report presented to Reagan last January, the commission concluded there was an acute crisis in the region and proposed a series of complex, long-range solutions emphasizing economic, social and humanitarian programs. The Administration quickly translated the findings into legislation and submitted it to Congress. But debate there has focused instead on highly controversial military questions involving Nicaragua's efforts to launch a communist revolution in the region. Meanwhile, the bulk of the commission's recommendations have become buried in House and Senate committees.

Jim Wright, D-Texas, the House Majority Leader, who served as a senior counselor to the commission, said of its report: "Unfortunately, it has not had the impact that it deserved to have. Maybe it isn't too late, once we get past the harshly divisive subtopics and focus instead on the long-range issues."

Wright counts among the divisive subtopics aid to the Nicaraguan guerrillas, the U.S. military presence in Honduras and continued aid to El Salvador. These are not unimportant questions, but, he said in an interview, they detract from any discussions of the central point of the Kissinger commission's report, the need for the United States "to begin to commit ourselves to a long-term program of economic and social development" for the region.

LONG-TERM PROGRAM

The commission did not ignore the problems of aid to El Salvador and the rebels in Nicaragua, but it took a broader perspective. It said: "Central America is our near neighbor and a strategic crossroads of global significance." After identifying the long festering social, political and economic problems in the region, the commission concluded they were being exacerbated by revolutionary forces in Nicaragua that were backed by Cuba and the Soviet Union. Nicaragua's revolutionary activities in neighboring El Salvador and elsewhere in the region must be neutralized, the commission said, by negotiation if possible, by force if necessary.

On a broader level, the commission said "the advance of Soviet and Cuban power on the American mainland affects the global balance" and required the United States "to defend against security threats near our borders. . . ."

The commission's solutions included $8 billion in economic aid over five years, as well as significantly increased military assistance to U.S. allies such as El Salvador and Honduras. And while it did not explicitly endorse U.S. support for the secret war against the government in Nicaragua, it said the Marxist-Leninist government there was a threat to the region and that the pressure applied by the antigovernment insurgents may force the Nicaraguan government to consider a negotiated settlement to the region's tensions.

In addition to the establishment of an innovative agency to distribute economic aid to all countries in the region, including Nicaragua if it made a commitment to social, political and economic reforms, the commission recommended establishing a literacy and teachers corps, scholarships for Central Americans to attend U.S. universities and increased housing and health programs.

It was a surprise to many, including the commission members themselves, that they managed to reach a consensus on U.S. goals and interests in Central America. Just as surprising, considering the group's bipartisan makeup, that consensus was a close approximation of Reagan's policies.

On the other hand, the Administration's critics were not surprised that the commission endorsed Reagan's policies; they assumed the President would not decide to appoint a commission that would disagree with him. But interviews with some members of the commission and its small staff suggest that something unusual happened among the commission's Democrats and Republicans, politicians and labor leaders, educators and others.

In addition to Kissinger, its chairman, the commission's members were former Republican Sen. Nicholas F. Brady of New Jersey; San Antonio Democratic Mayor Henry G. Cisneros; former Texas Gov. William P. Clements Jr., a Republican; Yale University professor Carlos F. Diaz-Alejandro; Wilson S. Johnson, chairman of the National Federation of Independent Business Inc.; Lane Kirkland, president of the AFL-CIO; Washington political analyst Richard M. Scammon; Boston University president John Silber; former Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart; former Democratic National Committee chairman Robert S. Strauss; and William B. Walsh, founder of Project Hope.

"I was astounded at what happened to that group," said William D. Rogers, a former career diplomat and Kissinger aide who served as a senior counselor to the 12 members. Many commission members, he said, began with only a "primitive understanding of Central America" and were biased in their solutions. "Liberals thought you just needed a New Deal for the region, and conservatives thought you just needed to bomb Cuba."

But the group "learned and came together" and produced, in Roger's view, a complex strategic report that went beyond bland generalities and took into account the interrelationships of politics, economics and human rights in the region. Some members changed their views on the issues in the process of hearing testimony in Washington, visiting Central America and debating and drafting their report. "They came up with a policy that took us beyond infectious bilateralism" Rogers said.

HARD-LINE CONSENSUS

This process may have contributed to the commission's surprisingly hard-line consensus on the problems in the region. Certainly not every member of the commission was prepared at the outset to endorse the Administration's thesis that the United States had to confront the threat posed to Central America and the Western Hemisphere by left-wing revolutions.

But the commission reached that conclusion at the end. It wrote: "The Soviet-Cuban challenge to make Central America part of their geostrategic challenge is what has turned the struggle . . . into a security and political problem for the United States and for the hemisphere." It also said that "the triumph of hostile forces" in the region would be "read as a sign of U.S. impotence."

This cold war reading of the Central American situation has always been the most controversial part of the Administration's policies there; skeptics have questioned whether there was a genuine, widespread communist threat to the region, and Congress has hesitated to approve aid based on these conclusions.

But this view was endorsed by all 12 commission members, including three who were perceived as anything but conservative on Central American politics: Cisneros, Diaz-Alejandro and Strauss. The conclusion served as the basis for the recommendation that the United States increase its military and economic aid to El Salvador, provided it was conditioned on improvements in human rights.

Commission members and staff agree that such a consensus may have surprised outsiders. Rogers said that these views emerged from several key events. Most crucial was a briefing the commission received from leaders of the Sandinista regime, including Daniel Ortega, the head of the government, in Managua last winter.

According to Walsh, a commission member who supported Administration policy before he was appointed, the Nicaraguans had an opportunity to begin a "dialogue" with Americans through the commission. Instead, they delivered what he called a "tirade" against U.S. policy.

Others who attended noted from the briefing that the Sandinistas clearly were using Soviet and Cuban intelligence information and that this erased any doubts commission members may have had about the links between the Soviets and Cubans and the Nicaraguans.

Commission members also received intelligence briefings from U.S. sources about Soviet and Cuban activity in the region. A fact that impressed them was the Soviet arms flow into Nicaragua and to the Salvadoran guerrillas. Several members of the commission concluded, in the words of a member, "Eventually, unless there was a change in the behavior of the Nicaraguans, the United States would find itself with a security problem in the region."

Commission members also heard from other governments in the region. According to Rogers, this was the "bombshell" that produced the commission's hard-line consensus. "They heard repeatedly from respected democratic leaders in the region the sense that the continuation of the Sandinista regime in its current form was incompatible with the long-term peace and security of the region," Rogers said.

According to Walsh, officials in Honduras who met with commission members feared they were about to be invaded. Administration officials familiar with the commission's briefings in the region said that officials in Costa Rica also expressed alarm about the Nicaraguans and that this "surprised" the commission.

"They didn't expect that, even though we'd been telling people that for years," said an Administration specialist on Central America.

MISUNDERSTOOD?

The commission completed its work in early January and released its report on Jan. 11. At that point, Rogers said, it "fell off the table."

The report presented a complex economic, political and military strategy for the region that was not easily digested or presented to the public. Instead, Rogers said, two perceptions dominated. First, in part because of Kissinger's connection with the effort, it was widely perceived that the report viewed the region entirely in terms of the East-West conflict and that it proposed a military solution to problems in the region.

Second, the surprising degree of consensus was partially hidden as public attention focused on two dissenting footnotes. One, supported by Cisneros and Diaz-Alejandro, stated clear opposition to continued U.S. support for guerrillas fighting the Nicaraguan government—a point on which the report had been vague. The other, signed by Kissinger and others, took issue with the report's conclusion that the United States should require improvements in human rights conditions before granting aid to El Salvador. Rogers said that these dissents were secondary to the broad agreement and should have been perceived that way.

"The extraordinary educational experience of the commission was not transferred to the American people at large in any respect," Rogers said.

He also blamed premature leaks about the commission's findings in major newspapers. Most stories appearing before the report was made public were "misinformed" in some aspect, Rogers said, and it was difficult to alter the impression they left. He cited a front-page Sunday New York Times story, written by Seymour M. Hersh, that concentrated almost exclusively on military aspects of the commission's work. Rogers said the story was based on a consultant's draft that already had been rejected.

Rogers also faulted himself and the commission for not working hard enough beforehand to obtain Latin American support for the findings. When the Latin Americans did react, they were luke-warm at best and appeared to be reacting to press accounts rather than the report itself.

Rogers described himself as "depressed and very disappointed" that the commission's consensus was not adopted by Congress or the public. "There was very little realization of the complex and comprehensive nature of what the commission proposed," he said. Rather than debate long-range strategy for the region, he said, Congress became entangled in the details of whether to send aid to El Salvador before or after the election there and whether it should be $90 million or $60 million. Discussion about the economic program presented in the report has been sparse.

But the commission's report has had some impact, even if it has not created a national consensus. "Some people felt a commission on Central America could end the debate. I never believed that. But it has changed the debate in some positive ways," said Rep. Michael D. Barnes, D-Md., a vocal critic of Administration policy in the region who served as a counselor to the commission but who has since distanced himself from some of its findings.

Barnes, who chairs the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, said the report educated Americans about the region, emphasized economic difficulties at a time when most attention was being focused on military and political problems and made it clear that in El Salvador, there was significant right-wing violence. On this last point, he said, it was, in effect, a repudiation of the Administration's policies, which he said "downplayed" right-wing violence.

Over all, Barnes said, "The commission raised the level of the debate. We now have a more knowledgeable debate."

Administration officials put it somewhat differently. "If nothing else, it showed we were on the right track," said Otto J. Reich, the State Department's coordinator for public diplomacy for Latin America and the Caribbean.

Another official, deeply involved in shepherding the Administration's aid program through Congress, said, "It has provided an element of political cover for those that are going to vote in favor of the Administration."

Nevertheless, there has been some grumbling about both the report and the Administration's handling of legislation implementing its recommendations.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, D-Conn., a leading critic of Administration policy, for example, criticized the report because it gave little emphasis to the "Contadora" peace process, an effort by Mexico, Colombia, Venezuela and Panama to mediate the conflicts in Central America and arrange a regional peace agreement.

"Here we have 132 pages of how to bring peace and stability and hope to the Latin Americans in the 1980s," Dodd said during Senate debate in early April on the El Salvador emergency aid package. "We have the four most significant Latin American countries trying to work out an answer to that. We study the problem, and when we get through studying the problem, they find themselves in one paragraph of a 132-page report. We wonder why there is some degree of skepticism about our intention."

Richard E. Feinberg, who served in the State Department and on the National Security Council staff during the Carter Administration and now is a fellow at the Overseas Development Council, said the commission concentrated on "worst-case scenarios that are unlikely and that can be prevented with a reasonably sensible diplomacy. The report raises the specter of offensive Soviet military bases on the isthmus. Yet no evidence is presented that either the Soviet Union or Central American governments are considering such a move, or why it would be in their advantage to do so." Feinberg made the comments in a critique of the commission's report that was presented to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last February.

More often, criticism has concerned the Administration's implementation of the report. "They picked out what they wanted and ignored what they didn't want," said a Latin American specialist who worked with the commission in drafting the recommendations.

The notion of conditioning aid to El Salvador on human rights improvements and other reforms was strongly endorsed by the Kissinger commission, for example, but a prominent commission member has accused the Administration of ignoring the recommendation.

"One of the ways we were able to achieve a bipartisan consensus was through strong conditionality language, but they walked away from it," said former Democratic National Committee Chairman Strauss in an interview. As a result, he has refused to speak out in favor of the Administration's legislative proposal.

Strauss, Rogers and others have also criticized the Administration's handling of a proposal for a Central American Development Organization, which is a key, if largely unnoticed, element in the report. The organization, with members from all Central American nations and a U.S. chairman, was designed as a multilateral alternative to traditional government-to-government assistance programs, which many believed have not worked and lack credibility.

A fourth of U.S. aid recommended in the report was to be distributed through the organization, which would distribute it to countries in the region that had made commitments to improve social, political and economic conditions and to refrain from military attacks on neighbors.

But critics said the Administration weakened the proposal when it was submitted to Congress. According to Rogers, the designation of the administrator of the Agency for International Development as the chairman of the development organization was exactly what the commission did not want. "This transfers a multilateral effort into an aid mechanism. It can't carry out the goals set by the commission."

DIVIDED CONGRESS

The primary reason Reagan appointed the Kissinger commission, of course, was to try to create more support for his policies in Congress. Even though the commission strongly endorsed most of Reagan's policies, Congress is still divided on the issues, mostly along party lines.

There was a consensus of sorts in April when the Senate approved its emergency aid package to El Salvador, but those who voted against the Administration said the majority were merely afraid of being tagged with "losing" El Salvador. And whatever consensus existed was quickly overshadowed by the controversy over the mining of Nicaraguan harbors. Meanwhile, as Congress concentrates on national security questions, the commission's broader recommendations are much further back in the legislative pipeline.

The Administration packaged them in legislation entitled the Central American Democracy, Peace and Development Initiative Act of 1984, and the bill was referred to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House Foreign Affairs Committee. There, stripped of the fancy title, the recommendations became part of those committee's annual efforts to produce foreign aid legislation.

Unfortunately for the commissions and the Administration, procedural difficulties and disputes within the House and Senate committees have made it impossible to pass foreign aid bills in the past two years, and this year may prove no different. Without the omnibus aid bills, portions of the commission's recommendations must be tacked on to appropriations bills and continuing resolutions.

Meanwhile, as debate in Congress focuses on U.S. military involvement in Central America, the commission's report has had little influence. Administration critics contend that this is because the commission did not say anything that was new.

Said a congressional staff member who specializes in Latin America and is critical of the Administration's policy: "If the purpose of the commission was to create a consensus behind the idea that we have interests in the region, we already knew that. It was just reaffirming a preexisting consensus."

The real debate, said the staffer, is not over goals but strategy: how the United States should respond to the continued presence of Marxist-Leninist governments in the region.

That view was echoed by Rep. Ed Zschau, R-Calif., a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee who recently visited El Salvador and who supports many of Reagan's policies. "I felt the Kissinger commission described the problems pretty accurately," Zschau said. "Where the debate focuses on is what to do to address them."

While it is true that the commission steered clear of policy details in an effort to avoid being seen as a shadow policy arm of the Administration, it did address several key strategy questions in broad terms. On El Salvador, for example, it came down strongly in favor of continued economic and military aid, contingent on human rights improvements there. And it concluded that it is in the interest of the United States to help El Salvador, Honduras and Costa Rica protect themselves from possible Nicaraguan aggression. The best way to do that, it said, is through a regional peace strategy, which it outlined in detail. Central to the commission's plan was the application of pressure on Nicaragua to end its support of the Salvadoran guerrillas and other leftist movements in the region.

NICARAGUA DEBATE

On the highly controversial question of U.S. military involvement in the region, and especially in support of the Nicaraguan rebels, known as "contras," the commission gave qualified support to the Administration's position.

Like the Administration, it viewed the political struggle in Nicaragua and El Salvador as a crisis that threatens U.S. national security. Moreover, it did not rule out the possibility of U.S. military activity in the region.

"Central America's crisis is our crisis," the report concluded on a note of unmistakable urgency. Like the Administration, a majority of commission members concluded that the existence of the Nicaraguan contras is having the positive effect of exerting pressure on the communist government there to negotiate an end to tensions in the region. On the question of using military force against Nicaragua, the report said: "Nicaragua must be aware that force remains an ultimate recourse."

But that urgency is not yet shared by Congress. Said Rep. Zschau, "The debate is hampered by what is reality" in Central America. "Some people in my district think the Salvadoran guerrillas represent the people," he said, adding that it isn't a view he shares.

Wright said that some members of Congress, unlike the Kissinger commission and the Administration, also sympathize with the Salvadoran rebels. "I don't think they consciously want to promote Marxism, but they romantically identify with the idea of a popular rebellion," he said.

But Wright said the Administration's support of the contras had hampered a consensus and noted that the commission did not conclude the United States had a right to disrupt the Sandinista regime.

Perhaps the most obvious reason for a lack of consensus is congressional distrust and suspicion about the ultimate aims and means of Administration policy. The Kissinger commission said use of U.S. troops should be regarded as a "last resort and only where there are clear dangers to U.S. security."

Judging from recent debate in Congress, Administration critics fear a major U.S. involvement is just around the corner. "We can see where this fellow is taking us," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., said recently. "I believe the day after he is reelected you will see American troops fighting in Latin America."

Both Administration officials and some members of the Kissinger commission argue that election-year politics and the closed minds of their critics are making matters worse in Congress.

Some Members of Congress worry that a position of strong support for Reagan's policies could be used against them politically. A way for them to put "political space" between themselves and the Administration, an Administration official said, is to put strong conditions on aid requests.

"The biggest problem is that individuals in Congress have very closed minds and fixed ideas" about Central America, said Walsh. He said some liberals are reluctant to accept the commission's conclusion that the United States must act to prevent the spread of leftist governments in the region.

A State Department official who specializes in Latin America, when asked why the Kissinger report had only minimal impact, said many of the views in Congress are based on a perception of the region that is several years old.

Referring to Robert White, a former U.S. ambassador to El Salvador who is critical of continued U.S. support for the country, the official said, "Bob White is describing a Central America that no longer exists."

He cited as evidence land reform, the elections this spring and in 1982 and a steady reduction in the number of political murders in the past few years.

Ironically, before the disclosures about the mining of Nicaraguan harbors caused a storm of protest, Congress appeared to be moving toward a consensus in support of emergency aid to El Salvador. Administration officials were predicting success in the House as well as the Senate. "When you get people aside," said an Administration lobbyist, "there is not a great deal of disagreement about the threat posed to the countries in the region by the spread of leftist governments."

But even before the mining was disclosed, this official conceded that support for the contras was highly controversial.

Also working in the Administration's favor, it seemed, were the Salvadoran elections in late March. Jose Napoleon Duarte, a moderate, led all other candidates. Duarte is now favored to win the presidency in a runoff later this spring against Roberto D'Aubuisson, a right-wing candidate who has been linked to the country's death squads.

Barnes believes Duarte will win and get broader support for his government. Duarte is well regarded by Congress and has pledged to open a dialogue with anti-government rebels, Barnes noted.

It is not clear whether the furor over Nicaragua will permanently negate that progress, or whether the Administration will be able to turn the debate back in the direction of El Salvador. But it unquestionably has lost ground.

[From The New Republic, May 7, 1984]

REMEMBER THE MINE

After the humiliation in Lebanon, the United States might at least have allowed a decent interval to pass before again making itself foolish in the eyes of the world. Yet we were back at it again with the Nicaraguan mining fiasco, a misadventure from its clumsy conception through its abrupt demise. And again, the display of incompetence was bipartisan, initiated by the Republican Administration and compounded by members of both parties in Congress. The C.I.A. apparently could not resist going beyond its role of providing assistance to anti-Sandinista rebel groups fighting in Nicaragua. It had to get its very own piece of the action, so it concocted schemes to involve itself directly in raiding a Nicaraguan port and then in laying mines in Nicaraguan harbors. The operations risked discovery, risked accusations that the United States was violating international law, risked arousing the indignation of countries whose shipping might be damaged. Yet the C.I.A. persuaded the President's national security adviser to walk its ideas into the Oval Office for approval, and he walked right out again with Mr. Reagan's O.K.

Congress's two intelligence oversight committees should have warned the Administration to drop its plans, but they didn't. Both were informed—in the case of the mining, the House's committee was told in January, the Senate's in March—but if the Members were listening to what they were being told, they did not focus on the implications of a direct C.I.A. operation. Senators Barry Goldwater and Daniel Patrick Moynihan protest that out of more than 130 pages of hearing transcript only two sentences referred to the mining, and did not mention the C.I.A.'s role. The Administration counters that its written submissions—as opposed to oral summaries—described and justified the operation in detail. If the C.I.A. was hiding, the Senate was not seeking. After Murphy's Law was fulfilled with its customary reliability in matters covert and American, Congress panicked—much as it did when the going got rough in Lebanon—and not only condemned the mining operation by lopsided margins in both Houses but also threatened to cut off funding for aid to the contras entirely. That move, if actually carried through when Congress returns from recess, would be at least as mindless as the mining itself.

We do not support aid to the contras with any relish. And in many respects we do not support the Reagan Administration's goals and methods in suplying aid. For example, the bulk of U.S. assistance goes to the rightist, Honduras-based Nicaraguan Democratic Force (F.D.N.), many of the field commanders of which were officers in Anastasio Somoza's brutal and justifiably detested National Guard. A far better prospect for winning the support of Nicaragua's people is the Democratic Revolutionary Alliance (ARDE) headed by the former anti-Somoza guerrilla leader Edén Pastora ("Comandante Cero"). Mr. Pastora's force has just captured a coastal town in southern Nicaragua, has been bolstered (according to news reports) by the defection of an entire battalion of Sandinista soldiers, and is planning to set up a government in exile. ARDE apparently does now receive C.I.A. help, but much less than the F.D.N.

The Administration's purposes in aiding the guerrilla groups are also suspect. ARDE has proposed a plan whereby antigovernment military activity would cease if the Sandinistas agree to hold fair elections this November—that is, if opposition candidates are guaranteed security from Sandinista toughs and the right to have their views heard free from censorship, and if the election is internationally supervised. The Reagan Administration has failed to endorse the ARDE proposal, leading to the suspicion that democracy in Nicaragua is not one of its primary goals. Indeed, there seems to be a split within the Administration over Nicaragua much as there was in Lebanon. One group, said to include Secretary of State Shultz, believes (sensibly, in our view) that aid to the contras should be designed to pressure Nicaragua into halting subversive activity against El Salvador and into entering serious peace negotiations with its neighbors. Another school of thought within the Administration—reportedly led by Secretary of Defense Weinberger and the C.I.A. director, William Casey—regards the very existence of a leftist Nicaragua as an intolerable menace to vital interests of the United States, and wants it expunged. In other words, there is agreement on means but not on ends. The result is a confusion of policy, as the covert war goes forward without any clear idea of what it is meant to accomplish. The immediate danger is that the Administration will fail to press convincingly for negotiations and peace, will arouse fears at home and abroad that the United States intends to send American troops into the region, and will encourage Congress to force an end to American activities in Central America. That could lead to an unpalatable choice between a regional Communist victory and the introduction of American troops.

Aiding the contras is not, by itself, a policy. But helping rebels, especially democratic rebels, with a view toward negotiations leading to some sort of regional settlement, is a policy, and a far better one than either letting the Sandinistas spread revolution or sending in U.S. troops. Could the Sandinista regime be won over with kindness, as all three Democratic Presidential candidates seem to propose? Something like that was tried by the Carter Administration after the new regime took power, and it didn't work. According to Alfonso Robelo Callejas, once a Somoza political prisoner, later a member of the Sandinistas' revolutionary junta, and now political director of ARDE, "It's possible that the United States pushed Castro into the arms of the Soviet Union, but that's not the case with the Sandinistas. The Carter Administration did everything possible to be friendly. It gave us $120 million in aid. It wanted to send a Peace Corps delegation until it was refused. On the other side, the Sandinistas had a secret defense agreement with Cuba from the beginning. That was the original foreign intervention. No government office when I was there was without a Cuban officer. The Cuban Ambassador sat at the table with the junta when it made its decisions."

Not much change in that department. According to both Administration and Congressional sources, there are now about eight thousand Cubans in Nicaragua, including three thousand military advisers installed in the Sandinista army of seventy-five thousand men, which is the largest army in Central America. From the outset the Sandinista regime has been dedicated to a "revolution without frontiers" in Central America, and has tried to destabilize not only El Salvador but also democratic Costa Rica. The Reagan Administration has failed to convince the American people and Congress with its evidence of Nicaragua's subversive activities, but a respected New York Times correspondent, Stephen Kinzer, reported on April 10 that European and Latin American diplomats based in Managua—including some whose governments have been critical of U.S. policy—now share the view that Nicaragua does indeed send military supplies to left-wing insurgents in El Salvador and provides training bases for them.

We believe that American policy toward Nicaragua must be one of both pressure and persuasion. To the extent that U.S.-aided forces tie down Nicaraguan forces and win popular support, the Sandinista regime will have to concern itself with its own security and cannot concentrate on making mischief across its borders. At the same time, the United States should make it clear that its goal is negotiation and political compromise both within Nicaragua and among the nations of Central America.

The trouble with the C.I.A.'s mining harbors aiding ex-Somocistas, and ignoring opportunities for negotiation is that they undermine America's credibility as a respecter of international law, a promoter of democracy, and a partner in peacemaking. However, for Congress to cut off aid to the contras in reaction to the mining fiasco also would damage America's credibility. It would mean—once again—that the United States had embarked on a policy that it would not follow through on, in the process encouraging people to fight for the freedom of their country and then abandoning them. The collapse of American policy in Lebanon was a nasty blow to American credibility. Either a Marxist-Leninist takeover of Central America or an American invasion would be far worse.

TRIBUTE TO ANSEL ADAMS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I pay tribute today to Ansel Adams—my friend, my colleague in addressing the great environmental issues of our times, and the greatest photographer of the American West that ever lived. Ansel Adams died this week. But as it can be said of all great lives, Ansel Adams has left America, and the world, with a legacy of camera art that has enriched us beyond words. Ansel Adams saw the West not only with his eyes, but with his soul. In the mountains, rivers, and valleys of the West he saw poetry, he saw truth, he saw wisdom, he saw grace. To Ansel, the terrain so gorgeously caught by his lens was not just Earth and sky, but spirit and vision. He saw wilderness as metaphor for the very fabric of our lives—mirroring, in our regard for it.

For over 50 years Ansel Adams traveled to every part of America and photographed the extraordinary beauty of our land, from Alaska to the Appalachians, from the Maine coast to California's Yosemite. I admired the work of Ansel Adams for many years. But I only got to know him personally in 1980 when we worked together on legislation to protect the Big Sur coast of California. At that time, Ansel was nearly 78 years old. He had been an ardent conservationist for more than 60 years. But in spite of his age, he was still one of the most forceful spokesmen for preservation of the natural environment I have ever met. He was still meeting new challenges, fighting for Big Sur, working to rid the Interior Department of James Watt.

Ansel Adams will be remembered for his life, and his art, and there was little difference in how he approached each. In his concern for preservation of America's wilderness, he mirrored his deep belief that we treat our physical setting not much different from how we treat our human family as a whole.

Ansel Adams cared deeply about the environment. He cared deeply about people. I and millions of Americans like me cared deeply about him and will deeply miss him.

IDA NUDEL'S BIRTHDAY

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, tomorrow is the 53d birthday of Ida Nudel, a woman well known to most of my Senate colleagues for her courage and devotion in assisting Soviet Jewish prisoners of conscience and their families.

In 1978, Ida herself was convicted of alleged hooliganism for having placed on her balcony a sign reading "KGB, Let Me Go." She was sentenced to 4 years of internal exile in Siberia. Upon completion of her sentence in March 1982, she was denied permission to live in her Moscow home and wandered for 6 anguished months before she found a town which would grant her a residence permit, the small Moldavian town of Bendery. For the past year she has worked as an attendant at a local amusement park despite her chronic heart condition. When this has flared up, she has not been allowed to leave Bendery to seek adequate medical treatment. Her mail is largely kept from her.

Last December, Ida celebrated the hope of the Chanukah holiday with a few friends quietly in her home. Since January she has been threatened by the local office of the supervisory committee on rules of religion with arrest for practicing religion without registering and receiving permission to do so.

Ida has been trying since 1971 to rejoin her sister in Israel. What a splendid birthday present it would be if the mighty Soviet state decided it had more important and worthy business than the pestering of sick women, and let Ida finally emigrate to join her sister in Israel.

CHILD SUPPORT ENFORCEMENT AMENDMENTS OF 1984

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be listed as a cosponsor of the committee substitute to H.R. 4325, the Child Support Enforcement Amendments of 1984, and that my name be included as part of the permanent RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION ON INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM, MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 132

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am sending to the Congress today four separate bills to attack the pressing and urgent problem of international terrorism.

In 1983 more than 250 American citizens were killed in terrorist attacks, the largest number in any year of record. In the wake of the tragic deaths of our diplomats and Marines, as well as French and Israeli soldiers in Lebanon, in light of the cynical murder of four South Korean cabinet officers and many others by North Korean terrorists in Burma, and as a result of the attack on our embassy in Kuwait, it is essential that we act immediately to cope with this menace and to increase cooperation with other governments in dealing with this growing threat to our way of life.

In the past fifteen years, terrorism has become a frightening challenge to the tranquility and political stability of our friends and allies. During the past decade alone, there have been almost 6,500 terrorist incidents. Over 3,500 people have been killed in these incidents, and more than 7,600 people have been wounded. American citizens have been the victims of more than 2,500 terrorist incidents. Of special concern to me has been the toll inflicted on our diplomats and members of the Armed Forces. I am also deeply concerned, however, about attacks against other American citizens, who have been the victims of forty percent of the terrorist incidents over the past decade.

In recent years, a very worrisome and alarming new kind of terrorism has developed: the direct use of instruments of terror by foreign states. This "state terrorism," starkly manifest in the recent dreadful spectacles of violence in Beirut, Rangoon, and Kuwait, accounts for the great majority of terrorist murders and assassinations. Also disturbing is state-provided training, financing, and logistical support to terrorists and terrorist groups. These activities are an extremely serious and growing source of danger to us, our friends and our allies, and are a severe challenge to America's foreign policy.

The protection of our citizens, our official personnel, and our facilities abroad requires the close cooperation and support of other governments. We depend on other governments to provide security protection to more than 250 United States diplomatic and consular posts abroad. We look to other governments to maintain the normal protections of law in their countries for our citizens living and traveling abroad and for our business representatives and business properties.

In 1983, this Administration sent to the Congress legislation to enable us to provide adequate protection for foreign officials in the United States. Not only is their protection essential to meet the obligations of the United States under international treaties, it is equally important to demonstrate to officials of other governments that they can count on full protection while they are in the United States.

I also asked the Congress to provide legislative authority for anti-terrorism training, and in some cases equipment, to foreign governments in order to enhance cooperation with governments on whom we must depend for protection abroad. In my view, the more effective and knowledgeable local law enforcement officials and officers are, the greater will be their ability to provide the kind of security both they and we need. I commend the Congress for providing a two-year authorization for this program and an appropriation of $2.5 million for 1984.

I am determined that my Administration will do whatever is necessary to reduce the incidence of terrorism against us anywhere in the world and to see that the perpetrators of terrorist acts are brought to justice. I believe it is essential, however, that the Executive branch, the Congress and the public clearly understand that combatting terrorism effectively requires concerted action on many different fronts. With trained personnel, effective laws, close international cooperation, and diligence, we can reduce the risks of terrorism to our people and increase the deterrent to future acts of terrorism.

Dealing with the immediate effect of terrorist violence is only part of the challenge, however. We must also assure that the states now practicing or supporting terrorism do not prosper in the designs they pursue. We must assure that international forums, such as the United Nations, take a balanced and practical view of who is practicing terrorism and what must be done about it. We must assure that governments that are currently passive—or inactive—respecting this scourge understand the threat that terrorism poses for all mankind and that they cooperate in stopping it. We must work to assure that there is no role in civilized society for indiscriminate threatening, intimidation, detention, or murder of innocent people. We must make it clear to any country that is tempted to use violence to undermine democratic governments, destabilize our friends, thwart efforts to promote democratic governments, or disrupt our lives that it has nothing to gain, and much to lose.

The legislation I am sending to the Congress is an important step in our war against terrorism. It will send a strong and vigorous message to friend and foe alike that the United States will not tolerate terrorist activity against its citizens or within its borders. Our legislative package consists of four separate bills, each of which is outlined below.

Act for the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Hostage-Taking

In September 1981, I signed the instrument ratifying the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, which was adopted by the United Nations on December 17, 1979. The convention has not been implemented domestically through enabling legislation, however. This legislation would implement the 1979 convention. It would amend the Federal kidnapping statute to provide for Federal jurisdiction over any kidnapping in which a threat is made to kill, injure, or continue to detain a victim in order to compel a third party to do or to abstain from doing something. This is a common ploy of terrorists. At the time I signed the instrument of ratification, the Congress was informed that the instrument of ratification would not be deposited with the United Nations until enabling legislation had been enacted. To demonstrate to other governments and international forums that the United States is serious about its efforts to deal with international terrorism, it is essential that the Congress provide the necessary enabling legislation, so that we may fully implement the Hostage-Taking Convention.

Aircraft Sabotage Act

The United States became a party to the Tokyo Convention, which covers certain offenses or acts committed aboard aircraft, in 1969 and the Hague Convention, concerning the suppression of unlawful seizure of aircraft, in 1971. The Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation was adopted at Montreal in 1971 and ratified by the United States in November 1972. The Montreal Convention requires all states party to it to establish jurisdiction over certain offenses affecting the safety of civil aviation.

The Congress has approved enabling legislation for the first two of these conventions but not for the Montreal Convention. This means that certain criminal acts related to aircraft sabotage or hijacking are not adequately covered by United States law. This gap in the law sends a false signal to terrorists, and it also indicates to other governments that we may not be as serious as we should be, and as in fact we are, in our efforts to combat international terrorism. Action by the Congress now would provide the basis for long-overdue implementation of this convention.

Act for Rewards for Information Concerning Terrorist Acts

Current law authorizes the payment of rewards for information concerning domestic crimes but is outdated. Maximum rewards are inadequate, and terrorism is not specifically included as a basis for paying a reward. Moreover, there is no authority for the payment of rewards for information on acts of terrorism abroad.

The proposed legislation, which is modelled on an existing statute that allows payment of rewards for information concerning the unauthorized manufacture of atomic weapons, recognizes that payment of a reward in connection with acts of domestic terrorism raises a matter of law enforcement that is properly within the jurisdiction of the Attorney General, but that the payment of a reward in connection with an act of terrorism abroad poses a political and foreign relations problem within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State. By increasing the amounts of fines that may be paid, and by authorizing rewards for information concerning terrorist acts committed abroad, this Act would markedly improve the ability of the Departments of Justice and State to obtain information leading to the freeing of hostages or the capture of the perpetrators of acts of terrorism. In passing this legislation, the Congress can further underscore the intent of the United States to take every appropriate and necessary step to protect its citizens and property from terrorist acts.

The training and support of terrorist groups and activities by a number of countries has reached alarming proportions. In addition, the number of states now using terrorism as an instrument of foreign policy is both increasing and highly disturbing. The provision of assistance to countries that support terrorism and use terrorism as a foreign policy tool has thus become a matter of grave concern to national security. This act, together with revised and strengthened regulations that the Department of State intends to issue shortly, would enhance the ability of the Department of Justice to prosecute persons involved in the support of terrorist activities and of states using terrorism. Enactment of this legislation would be a strong contribution to the effort to combat terrorism.

We must recognize that terrorism is symptomatic of larger problems. We must dedicate ourselves to fostering modernization, development, and beneficial change in the depressed areas of the world. We must renew our commitment to promoting and assisting representative and participatory governments. We must attack the problem of terrorism as a crime against the international community whenever and wherever possible, but we must strive to eradicate the sources of frustration and despair that are the spawning places and nutrients of terrorism.

The legislative proposals that I am sending to the Congress today will, when approved, materially benefit our Nation and help us to assist friendly countries. I believe that they are extraordinarily important, and I strongly urge that the Congress undertake their timely consideration and speedy passage.

RONALD REAGAN.

TEXAS WILDERNESS ACT OF 1984

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, it is my pleasure to introduce today a bill to designate five wilderness areas in the national forests of east Texas. I am joined in this by my distinguished colleague from Texas (Mr. TOWER). This legislation is identical to H.R. 3788, which was approved yesterday by the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

This legislation will designate about 34,000 acres of Federal land as components of the National Wilderness Preservation System, thereby insuring that they will remain unspoiled for the enjoyment of future generations.

This bill has been a long time in the making. But the preservation of these unique and unspoiled areas is all the sweeter for the work that went into it.

I remember very well the long struggle to enact my legislation to establish the Big Thicket National Preserve, to save the last unspoiled remnants of one of this Nation's truly unique ecological areas. There is an immense satisfaction in visiting those areas now, in feeling that special feeling of timelessness that is associated only with great natural beauty, and in knowing that our children's children will be able to stand where we stand today and savor the same beauty that we enjoy.

This legislation will extend permanent protection to five more unique and beautiful ecological areas of east Texas. Almost all of these areas are now owned by the Federal Government as part of the national forest system. The sole exceptions to this are certain tracts associated with the Indian Mounds and Upland Islands wilderness areas. These tracts, which are needed to round out the borders of these wilderness areas, are now in private ownership. However, under the provisions of this bill they will be acquired, with the agreement of the current owners, by an exchange of other national forest lands of comparable value. Thus this legislation will not cost the taxpayers any money.

These five areas—Big Slough, Little Lake Creek, Turkey Hill, Upland Island, and Indian Mounds—represent a broad spectrum of east Texas ecosystems, from hardwood bottomland to upland pine forests, from a permanent spring pool where pioneer wagon trains once watered to the largest longleaf pine tree in the Nation. These areas show off the best and most beautiful of these habitats.

The Big Slough Wilderness in the Davy Crockett National Forest is an outstanding example of an east Texas hardwood bottomland ecosystem, and this area boasts the Texas champion water elm as well as a wide variety of other plants and animals.

Little Lake Creek Wilderness, in the Sam Houston National Forest, encompasses both upland pine forests and hardwood bottomlands.

The Turkey Hill Wilderness, in the Angelina National Forest, contains clear creeks fed by seep springs, with upland pine areas and bottomland hardwood areas of beech and magnolia as well as oak and hickory trees.

The Upland Island Wilderness, in the Angelina National Forest, is one of the most diverse of these areas. It contains the largest tree in the national forests of east Texas, a bald cypress, the largest longleaf pine tree in the Nation, rock columns, and a river suitable for canoeing.

The Indian Mounds Wilderness, in the Sabine National Forest, is the largest of these proposed wilderness areas, and it features a number of unique ecological groupings of plants as well as a permanent spring pool where pioneer wagon trains watered, fossil beds, and petrified rock.

All of these areas are relatively close to major population centers such as Dallas and Houston. The preservation of these unspoiled areas will help to meet the growing demand for recreational areas for our urban population and for tourists from other States while protecting these fragile resources for future enjoyment.

This legislation will also settle any possible questions about the roadless area review and evaluation process conducted by the U.S. Forest Service. It will specify that the remaining national forest lands in Texas that were studied under the RARE II process, but that are not designated as wilderness by this bill, will be released for normal multiple-use management by the Forest Service. Possible court challenges of the RARE II final environmental statement on these lands will be prohibited.

Mr. President, I am pleased that this compromise bill has been worked out, and I want to recognize two distinguished members of the Texas Congressional delegation, Congressman JOHN BRYANT and Congressman CHARLES WILSON, for their successful efforts to work out this compromise. Congressman BRYANT is only in his first term in the House of Representatives, but he has demonstrated his leadership abilities in introducing this legislation in the House and in shepherding it successfully through the long negotiations and committee consideration that have led to this point.

This legislation is supported by a wide range of environmental groups, sportsman's groups, and others who care deeply about preserving the natural resources that make east Texas such a unique and beautiful area. I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague from Texas (Mr. TOWER) in introducing this bill, and I urge its enactment into law.●

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this bill designed to insure forever the spectacular beauty of some of east Texas' most impressive forest lands. The State of Texas' desire to designate the proposed areas as part of the National Wilderness Preservation System expresses our hope that generations of Texans to come, and all Americans alike, may one day experience the awesome natural drama of totally undisturbed wilderness lands. Indeed, it is important that Texas be allowed to complete in this Congress the original congressional intent of the Wilderness Act of 1964 and offer more recent wilderness studies such as RARE II in order to preserve this especially unique forest land in the eastern portion of our State.

One cannot comprehend the splendor of these pristine wilderness areas by mere description. Few realize the bountiful variety of flora and fauna that are sustained in the piney woods of east Texas, an area where I spent much of my childhood.

The five areas from which the wilderness land will be designated—Graham Creek, Turkey Hill, Indian Mounds, Big Slough, and Little Creek—contain a spectrum of natural wonders. From beaver ponds to rich seabeds of fossils 25 million years old, and other historic sites, these forest lands also nurture a variety of hardwoods including a unique and rare mature beech-magnolia forest. Many species of wildflowers cover the forest floor, and one may often encounter rare orchids. The varieties of birds, insects, reptiles, and plant life comprise a complex ecosystem that is a natural laboratory for scientists and nature enthusiasts alike.

Since the turn of the century, man's appreciation of uninhabited lands has necessarily changed. The profusion of populated areas has mandated the conservation and preservation of resources which sustain us economically and esthetically. Therefore, in designating these 34,000 acres as wilderness, we must be prudent. We must maintain a balance of these desired goals, weighing cost against benefit.

To set aside as wilderness lands less than 5 percent of the national forest lands in Texas, which are multiple-use lands, is, in my view, a modest proposal. The only other wilderness areas in Texas are in the Guadalupe Mountains of west Texas, which are not easily accessible to most Texans. The east Texas areas are located adjacent to the most populous centers of our State, therefore, magnifying the recreational potential of these wilderness areas. Even hunting, fishing, and camping will be enhanced by protection of the national wildlife habitat. Only clearcutting and roadbuilding will be prohibited; yet, this bill will allow certain soil conservation and watershed protection benefits to occur. Mineral interests will continue to be held by private sources. Furthermore, it should be noted that management costs of these wilderness areas will be low because wilderness simply manages itself.

Mr. President, the opportunity to preserve a portion of the natural heritage of our country in the State of Texas is one that we in the Senate have a responsibility to seize. To protect the delicate balance of life in these forest lands is to defend creation in its purest and most glorious form. Indeed, we would be vain to deny the knowledge of such a natural heritage to generations to come.

I therefore urge my colleagues to support this worthwhile measure.●

By Mr. HELMS (by request):

S. 2599. A bill to simplify the administration, contain escalating costs, and create greater flexibility in the operation of programs under the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

CHILD NUTRITION AMENDMENTS OF 1984

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today I introduce on behalf of the administration legislation to extend and reform various child nutrition programs.

Five programs expire this year, and the administration is recommending the reauthorization of four of these.

The administration has made very modest proposals which would result in relatively small savings, approximately $48.7 million in fiscal year 1985. Frankly, I feel that further examination is needed into the operation of these programs. I have offered legislation—S. 1994 and S. 2545—which would propose additional changes, particularly with respect to increasing the accountability and targeting of the day care home portion of the child care food program and the summer food service program.

Nonetheless, the administration has done a commendable job of identifying areas for improvement. The proposals are especially aimed to improve the administrative aspects of these programs at the Federal, State, and local levels.

The Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry is scheduled to begin markup deliberations on all child nutrition legislation, including the administration's bill, beginning next Wednesday, May 2.

Obviously, the committee has a challenge ahead of it in attempting to deal with these and other popular programs in a fiscally responsible and realistic way during these times of fiscal restraint.

I ask unanimous consent that a letter of transmittal from Deputy Secretary of Agriculture Dick Lyng, a section-by-section summary, and the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

tional School Lunch Act, rounded to the nearest 1 cent increment."; and

"(c)(1) From the amounts appropriated under subsection (b) for any fiscal year and available for allotment under this subsection, the Secretary shall allot to each State an amount which bears the same ratio to the available amounts for that fiscal year as the amounts provided by the Secretary under the provisions of law listed in paragraph (2) to the State and entities in the State for fiscal year 1983 bore to the total amount appropriated for such provisions of law for fiscal yar 1983. The Secretary may reduce a State's allotment as determined under the preceding sentence taking into account funds which were provided by the Secretary of Agriculture to Head Start Programs through the Child Care Food Program (referenced in paragraph 2) but which are available to the Department of Health and Human Service for Head Start Programs.

Such costs may include planning, administration, education, technical assistance, evaluation and State administrative costs associated with providing such assistance.

"(2) A State may not use amounts paid to it under this section to—

"(A) purchase or improve land, purchase, construct, or permanently improve (other than minor remodeling) any building or other facility or purchase major equipment, other than food service equipment, or

"(B) satisfy any requirement for the expenditure of non-Federal funds as a condition for the receipt of Federal funds.

The Secretary may waive the limitation contained in paragraph (A) upon the request of a State if the Secretary finds that there are extraordinary circumstances to justify the waiver and that granting the waiver will assist in carrying out this section.

The State shall provided for public input during development of the report. The report shall contain the following information concerning funds received under this section:

"(3) Each State shall obtain financial and compliance audits of any grant funds which the State receives under this section. Such audits shall be made public within the State on a timely basis. The audits shall be conducted at least every two years by an organization or person independent of any agency administering activities under this section. The audits shall be conducted in accordance with the Comptroller General's Standards for Audit of Governmental Organizations, Progams, Activities and Functions.

"(4) Each State shall, after being provided by the Secretary with adequate notice and opportunity for a hearing within the State, repay to the Secretary amounts found not to have been expended in accordance with the requirements of this section. If such repayment is not made, the Secretary shall, after providing the State with adequate notice and opportunity for a hearing within the State, offset such amounts against the amount of any allotment to which the State is or may become entitled under this section.

"(5) The State shall make copies of the reports required by this subsection available for public inspection within the State.

"Nondiscrimination

"(2) No person shall on the ground of sex be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under, any program or activity that receives Federal financial assistance under this section; provided, however, that this subsection shall not be read as prohibiting any conduct or activities permitted under the Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972.

"(3) Whenever the Secretary finds that a State, or an entity that has received a payment from an allotment to a State under subsection (c), has failed to comply with a provision of law referred to in paragraph (1), with paragraph (2), or with an applicable regulation (including one prescribed to carry out paragraphs (1) and (2)), the Secretary shall notify the chief executive officer of the State and shall request the securing of compliance. If within a reasonable period of time, not to exceed sixty days, the chief executive officer fails or refuses to secure compliance, the Secretary may—

"(A) refer the matter to the Attorney General with a recommendation that an appropriate civil action be instituted,

"(B) exercise the powers and functions provided by Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, or section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, as may be applicable, or

"(C) take such other action as may be provided by law.

"(4) When a matter is referred to the Attorney General pursuant to subparagraph (3)(A), or whenever there is reason to believe that a State or an entity is engaged in a pattern or practice in violation of a provision of law referred to in paragraph (1) or in violation of paragraph (2), the Attorney General may bring a civil action in any appropriate district court of the United States for such relief as may be appropriate, including injunctive relief."

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., April 19, 1984.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed for the consideration of Congress is a draft bill "To simplify the administration, contain escalating costs and create greater flexibility in the operation of programs under the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966." This draft legislation will contribute to important goals shared by the Administration and Congress to streamline programs and simplify administrative requirements and procedures, to decrease error and the potential for fraud, to contain escalating program costs, and to enhance State flexibility. The Department recommends enactment of this legislation.

The draft bill would amend the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 to consolidate two restrictive categorical programs, the Summer Food Service Program for Children and the Child Care Food Program, into a Non-School Food Program Grant designed to permit States the maximum flexibility in designing programs to meet the particular needs of their low-income children. The grant would be funded at the Fiscal Year 1985 current services level for the two programs it would replace. This level does not include the $80.4 million for nutrition funding for Head Start grantees which will be provided by the Department of Health and Human Services. This change is proposed in order to simplify administration of the Head Start Program both for the Federal government and for grantees. The Nutrition Education and Training Program is being proposed for termination since this program has served its intended purpose.

Up to $3,000,000 would be authorized for State Administrative Expenses (SAE) to reimburse food stamp agencies for the costs incurred in providing to eligible households a document which confirms that the household currently participates in the Food Stamp Program. For food stamp households, this document can be used to meet the income verification requirements of the National School Lunch and School Breakfast Programs. In addition, changes would be made to the SAE provisions which would prevent a State from retaining unobligated funds in excess of its foreseeable needs. The Secretary also would be given the discretion to reallocate funds to States which can demonstrate the ability to efficiently and effectively use funds in excess of their formula allocation.

The amendments would extend the operation of the Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants and Children, State Administrative Expenses, and the Commodity Distribution Program. These extensions are for one year, since all three of the programs currently are the subject of studies and evaluations which may pinpoint changes to be made in the programs.

The amendments would make changes in the funding of administrative costs for the WIC Program to promote greater efficiency in the operation of the Program. These changes include: 1) lowering the percent of funds available for administrative costs from 20 to 18 percent of the funds provided, 2) eliminating the reallocation provisions and 3) deleting the specific requirement to spend one-sixth of the administrative grant for nutrition education.

This legislative package does not specifically address the expiring requirement to maintain a programmed level of commodity assistance for the Elderly Feeding Program. The Department of Health and Human Services has proposed legislation which would amend the National School Lunch Act and assign administrative responsibility for this aspect of program operation to the Administration on Aging (AOA). This Department would continue to purchase commodities at the request of AOA. The change would simplify program administration by centralizing administration in one Federal agency.

The amendments in the bill would provide an estimated Fiscal Year 1985 savings of $48.7 million. This will enable us to make essential reductions in Federal expenditures and focus resources to assure service of free and reduced-price lunches to the most needy children.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that enactment of the proposed legislation would be in accord with the program of the President.

A similar letter is being sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Sincerely,

RICHARD E. LYNG,
Acting Secretary.

CHILD NUTRITION AMENDMENTS OF 1984—SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

MODIFICATIONS TO STATE ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSE FUNDING

SEC. 2. This section would prevent a State from retaining funds that the State has not obligated and which are in excess of its foreseeable needs by limiting the amount of unobligated funds which a State may retain at the end of the fiscal year. The limit would be established at a level equal to ten percent of the funds provided. The section also gives the Secretary discretion in the matter of reallocating funds to those States which can demonstrate the ability to efficiently and effectively use funds in excess of their formula allocation.

STATE ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSE FUNDS FOR INCOME VERIFICATION COSTS

SEC. 3. Since implementation of the income verification requirements in the school lunch program, savings have accrued to the Federal government. This proposal would help defray locally borne costs of verification by reimbursing the administrative costs incurred in providing a certificate of food stamp participation to food stamp households which can be used in the school lunch vertification process.

EXTENSION OF THE STATE ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 4. This section amends Section 7 of the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 to extend the authorizing authority for the appropriation of funds to pay State Administrative Expenses for a year. We intend to thoroughly examine the current SAE formula, the usage of funds and provisions for carryover, and this may lead to recommended alternative methods for SAE reimbursement. The current authorization expires on September 30, 1984.

INDEPENDENT SPECIAL ASSISTANCE FACTOR FOR REDUCED-PRICE LUNCHES AND BREAKFASTS

SEC. 5. Section 11(a) of the National School Lunch Act is amended to create a separate special-assistance factor for reduced-price lunches with a base of 68.75 cents on July 1, 1983. This separate factor will be adjusted annually based on the change in the Consumer Price Index for food away from home. Because the current law ties the reduced-price subsidy to the free subsidy (it is currently 40 cents less for lunches and 30 cents less for breakfasts), reduced-price meals currently receive a higher increase when an adjustment for inflation is made. Under this proposal, the maximum price for reduced-price meals would not remain fixed at 40 cents for lunches and 30 cents for breakfasts. Instead, these prices would rise in response to the difference between free and reduced-price meal subsidies and in effect would experience the same adjustments to account for increases in inflation. Section 4 of the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 is similarly amended to create a July 1, 1983 subsidy base of 32.75 cents for regular reduced-price breakfasts and 45.50 cents for severe need reduced-price breakfasts. These independent subsidy bases for reduced-price meals would produce a cost savings of $6.7 million in Fiscal Year 1985.

TERMINATION OF THE SUMMER FOOD SERVICE PROGRAM FOR CHILDREN

SEC. 6. Section 13 of the National School Lunch Act is repealed thus eliminating the Summer Food Service Program for Children. (See Sec. 8. below.)

TERMINATION OF THE CHILD CARE FOOD PROGRAM

SEC. 7. The Child Care Food Program is terminated by the repeal of section 17 of the National School Lunch Act. (See SEC. 8. below.)

NONSCHOOL FOOD PROGRAM GRANT

SEC. 8. This section creates a new Non-School Food Program Grant. A new Section 17 is inserted, which is described below.

The Administration proposes to consolidate the categorical Summer Food Service and Child Care Food Programs by replacing them with a Non-School Food Program Grant. This grant will substantially increase State flexibility and achieve two major effects. First, administrative efficiencies will be realized through a reduction in program complexity. Second, States will be able to tailor programs under this grant to meet the specific needs of their State's population. Funds would be targeted to meet the food assistance needs of children primarily from low-income households. Funding for this consolidation of programs has been set at the current services level in 1985, thus no savings to the Federal government were included in the President's Fiscal Year 1985 Budget. However, savings have been included in out-year cost estimates because the proposal stabilizes the funding level. The Department believes the grant approach will simplify program administration and will reduce cost. Savings after Fiscal Year 1985, therefore, would rise from $47 million in 1986 to over $233 million in 1989.

Subsection (b) authorizes, for each of the Fiscal Years 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, $443.7 million for carrying out the purposes of Section 17. This funding level does not include funds for food service in Head Start Programs because these meals will be funded by the Department of Health and Human Services.

Subsection (c) requires the Secretary to allot to States from available appropriated funds, an amount which bears the same ratio to the total appropriated funds as the States' allotment under the Summer Food Service Program and the Child Care Food Program for Fiscal Year 1983 bore to the total funds appropriated for those programs. The Secretary will maintain authority to adjust the allotment level based on the funds transferred to the Department of Health and Human Services for the Head Start Program. For example, the Department may adjust a State's grant level based on the fact that a large portion of their Child Care Food Program funds were directed to Head Start Programs.

Subsection (d) provides that the Secretary shall make payments to States from the allotments determined under subsection (c). Any funds unobligated by the States at the end of a fiscal year are to remain available to a State for the next fiscal year, for the same purposes as originally given.

Subsection (e) limits the use of funds to States under Section 17 to payment for the provision of nutrition assistance to children and related activities such as planning, administration, education, technical assistance and evaluation. States may not use funds given under Section 17 to (1) purchase or improve land, or purchase, construct, or permanently improve buildings or facilities, or purchase major equipment, except food service equipment; or (2) satisfy any requirement for the expenditures of non-federal funds as a prerequisite for receipt of Federal funds.

The Secretary may, upon demonstration by the State that extraordinary circumstances exist, waive the restrictions regarding land purchase or construction.

Subsection (f) requires each State, as a prerequisite to receipt of funds under Section 17, to submit an intended use report to the Secretary. The report must contain a statement of the State's goals and objectives in using funds, a description of the types of activities to be carried out, the geographic areas and characteristics of individuals to be served, and the criteria for and method of fund disbursement.

Subsection (g) requires States to prepare annual reports concerning activities carried out under Section 17. These reports will describe how the State has met the goals and objectives established in their intended use report.

States are required to establish and maintain fiscal control and fund accounting procedures to ensure proper disbursal of and accounting for Federal funds.

States are also required to conduct biennial financial and compliance audits of activities under Section 17. These State audits are to be conducted by an entity independent of the administering agency and in accordance with the Comptroller General's standards.

After notice and opportunity for a hearing, a State must repay to the Secretary amounts found not to have been expended in accordance with the requirements of Section 17. If repayment is not made, the Secretary may offset the amount due from funds due the State under subsection (d).

The State must make copies of the required reports and audits available for public inspection within the State.

Subsection (h) makes clear that activities and programs funded under this section are "receiving Federal financial assistance" for purposes of Federal legislation prohibiting discrimination on the basis of age, handicap, sex, race, color and national origin. The subsection also establishes the procedure the Secretary is to follow in assuring State compliance with the nondiscrimination provision.

TERMINATION OF THE NUTRITION EDUCATION AND TRAINING PROGRAM

SEC. 9. Section 19 of the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 is repealed in order to terminate the Nutrition Education and Training Program. This program, authorized in 1977, originally provided seed money for the States to begin or augment existing nutrition education programs. These programs are now well established and the Federal purpose has been served. Now the States should be given the opportunity to determine and implement their own nutrition education programs. This proposal will save $5 million in Fiscal Year 1985.

ELIMINATION OF DIRECT FEDERAL ADMINISTRATION OF PROGRAMS

SEC. 10. This provision would repeal the legislative requirement that the Food Nutrition Service (FNS) operate Child Nutrition Programs, including the Special Milk Program, in States which do not administer these programs through their own agencies. FNS Regional Offices currently operate portions of the school nutrition programs in 14 States, the Child Care Food Program in nine States and the Summer Food Service Program in 17 States where State law or policy prevent State agencies from doing so. The burden of administering these programs, added to the Regional Offices' normal duties, creates an immense workload for these offices. Since States are responsible for making Federal programs available to their citizens, it is an inappropriate use of Federal resources to act as a State agency in administering these programs. Finally, this action would resolve some of the ambiguities created by having differing rules for States and Regions with respect to audit closures, report submission deadlines, and other administrative activities.

EXTENSION OF THE COMMODITY DISTRIBUTION PROGRAM

SEC. 11. This section would amend Section 14 of the National School Lunch Act to extend for a year the authorization for funding to provide agricultural commodities to programs operating under the National School Lunch Act, and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966. The current authorization expires on September 30, 1984.

CHANGE IN LUNCH COMMODITY ALLOTMENT FORMULAS

SEC. 12. This provision stipulates that commodity allotments be based on the actual number of meals served during the previous school year instead of an estimate of the number of meals that will be served. This change will enable the Secretary to establish initial commodity entitlements for each State at the beginning of the year based on actual data reported by States. These initial allocations would be revised slightly to reflect final meal service reports. States will have greater assurances of the level of commodities they will receive during the year and, therefore, will not be forced to revise their anticipated commodity levels because the Department changes its projection of the annual number of meals during the year.

EXTENSION OF THE SUPPLEMENTAL FOOD PROGRAM FOR WOMEN, INFANTS AND CHILDREN (WIC)

SEC. 13. This provision extends the program for one year. Currently, the WIC Program is the subject of three major research efforts which may identify desirable changes in the program's design. Thus, extension of the program for a longer period of time is unadvisable at this time.

ELIMINATION OF THE REALLOCATION PROVISIONS FOR THE WIC PROGRAM

SEC. 14. This section would eliminate the provisions which require regular reallocation of program funds. The WIC Program has stabilized over the years and is not experiencing problems with unspent funds. Rather, States are spending according to plans established at the beginning of each fiscal year. By eliminating the reallocation provisions, States will be assured of their annual grant and the Agency will not be required to perform reallocations of the ever decreasing pot of excess funds.

CHANGE IN THE WIC PROGRAM ADMINISTRATIVE COST ALLOWANCE

SEC. 15. This provision will reduce from 20 percent to 18 percent the percentage of total authorized funds for the WIC Program that will be available for State and local administrative costs. This change will serve to encourage efficiency in the administration of this program. The program has been operating on a stable basis for several years so States are in a good position to strengthen their operating processes to make them more efficient. As a further help, the Department also proposes to remove the requirement that States spend one-sixth of these funds for nutrition education. A requirement to provide some form of nutrition education would be retained.

ELIMINATION OF SPECIAL ASSISTANCE CERTIFICATION ALTERNATIVES

SEC. 16. This proposal amends Section 11(a) of the National School Lunch Act by removing the two special assistance certification alternatives which based assistance on prior year free and reduced-price lunch eligibility. This eliminates the authority for some schools to accept applications and determine eligibility once every two years where 80 percent of the children were eligible for free or reduced-price meals or once every three years where all meals were served free. Elimination of this authority is consistent with the emphasis on verification of applications to prevent fraud and abuse. These are the schools which will benefit most from annual certification and verification procedures to ensure correct applications.

ELIMINATION OF OBSOLETE PROVISIONS

SEC. 17. This section amends and repeals several sections of the National School Lunch Act to eliminate various obsolete provisions.

CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

SEC. 18. This section amends the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 to delete references to the Summer Food Service and Child Care Food Programs.

EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 19. The effective dates for the individual provisions are specified to be consistent with the intent of the legislation.●

By Mr. KASTEN:

S. 2600. A bill to reduce tax rates in a manner that is fair to all taxpayers and to simplify the tax laws by eliminating most credits, deductions, and exclusions; to the Committee on Finance.

FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX ACT OF 1984

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing the fair and simple tax plan. This plan is also being introduced in the House of Representatives by my friend and colleague JACK KEMP. We believe that an overhaul of our tax system is long overdue and offer this plan as an alternative. It is fair, simple, and yet still provides incentives for saving, investment, risk-taking activities, and economic growth.

The Kasten-Kemp plan combines the best features of a flat tax system—a simple low tax rate applied to all taxpayers—with special provisions for wage earners, families with children, savers, and homeowners. For the benefit of my colleagues, I would like to offer a brief summary of the fast plan. The basic provisions are:

First, it cuts the top marginal tax rate by half—to 25 percent. The result is that the Federal Government will not take more than 25 cents of every dollar earned;

Second, it simplifies the Tax Code by eliminating many of the tax preferences—deductions, exclusions and credits—in the Tax Code. But, it does keep the current tax treatment for mortgage interest, charitable contributions, property taxes, IRA's, and the expenses of earning income;

Third, it is oriented toward families by doubling the personal exemptions and increasing the zero bracket amount. The result is that a family of four would not pay tax on the first $14,375 of its income. Currently, the same family does not pay tax on the first $8,936 of yearly income. This is $5,439 more tax-free income than a family has today;

Fourth, it does not require the American taxpayers to pay any more to the Treasury than they do now. The poorest families will pay no tax, and lower- and middle-income families will not be paying higher taxes;

Fifth, it protects taxpayers from inflation by maintaining indexing of the personal exemptions and the zero bracket amount. The capital gains base is also indexed, so that only real income gains are taxed; and,

Sixth, it provides incentives for savings and investment by maintaining the current tax treatment for IRA's, Keogh's pensions, and depreciation.

The American people deserve a Tax Code that is simpler. Two weeks ago, taxpayers all across the country were facing the last minute crisis of filing their Federal tax returns. As we all know, this is no easy task. There are over 5,105 pages in the Internal Revenue Code, about 10,000 pages of IRS interpretations of that Code, and we have just adopted a new tax amendment that runs over 1,300 pages. The House of Representatives has also adopted a tax bill that is just as long. And, by the time Congress finishes its seventh major tax bill in 10 years, the IRS will be more confused than it is now. In fact, the IRS admits that its own tax advice is wrong in 3 percent of all cases. This is not the fault of the IRS. It is the fault of years of tax legislation.

Over the years, inflation and the progressive Tax Code have produced a climate in this country that encourages Americans to continue to consume, rather than save and invest. This consumption comes at the expense of economic growth and productivity. Theoretically, our progressive tax system raises Government revenue in a fair and equitable manner. In reality, the steep and graduated tax schedule provides an incentive to avoid activities that are subject to high taxes—activities such as work, saving, investing, and risk taking.

The present tax system has also provided great incentive for taxpayers to avoid taxes both through legal loopholes and blatant tax evasion. In fact, depending on their sources of income and their opportunities to take advantage of tax preferences, taxpayers earning the same amount of income can pay very different rates—and amounts—of tax. According to the Joint Committee on Taxation, there are 109 special exemptions, deductions, and credits in the Tax Code, which will amount to a revenue loss to the Federal Treasury of $327 billion this fiscal year. These are preferences above and beyond the normal tax deductions for individuals and corporations, and amount to more than the projected deficit for this year—about $200 billion.

The magnitude of tax evasion is also large, with the underground economy conservatively estimated at $100 billion this year.

This behavior of widespread tax avoidance, both legal and illegal, is due to the high marginal tax rates of the current Federal income tax system. As Congress passes laws which, in one way or another, exclude large amounts of income from the tax base, higher tax rates must be adopted on the remaining income just to break even. As the tax rates rise, so does the incentive to avoid paying taxes—both legally and illegally. In fact, some economists and tax experts believe that this avoidance has actually led to a system that is less progressive in reality than on paper.

That is why I am offering this bill today. This bill—the fast plan—is an alternative to the current confusion and widespread inequality in the Tax Code. The fast plan provides a single low rate on income, and is simple enough to figure without a tax table. Unlike some tax reform plans, there are no surtaxes or complicated ways to take deductions against only part of your income, but not the rest. With this plan, if a deduction is allowed, it is allowed in full; we have made sure to maintain essential deductions in the current tax law.

The fast plan also provides significant tax relief for many Americans. Over 1 million taxpayers will be taken off the tax rolls with this plan. And, the working family of four will not even pay taxes on the first $14,375 of income. Then it only pays 25 percent of what is left after allowed deductions. No one below the poverty line will pay any taxes.

Mr. President, the American people are tired of a tax system that robs Peter to pay Paul; that grants loopholes for some, but not for all. The American taxpayers are demanding a change. This legislation is my answer to them. It is time for a major overhaul of our current tax system. I believe the Kemp-Kasten fast plan is a good start in that direction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2600

By Mr. PRESSLER:

S. 2602. A bill to simplify the program of grants to the States for vocational education, and for other purposes.

GRANTS FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I have been an active supporter of vocational education. Vocational education inspires youth initiative, rescues disoriented unemployed individuals, and solves many of the social problems to which unemployment can lead.

The measure I am introducing today would extend the Vocational Education Act while making some changes in the funding of specific programs. There are several different approaches to restructuring voc-ed programs, and I realize this bill is only one of many suggested concepts. These programs should continue, and I offer this legislation in the hope that it might serve as a vehicle for reviewing the current voc-ed system.

My bill extends the Vocational Education Act for 5 years. This measure also incorporates the block grant funding mechanism to give State and local education agencies more flexibility to structure programs in a manner consistent with local priorities.

The bill would reduce funding formula problems by establishing block grants to States. As proposed by President Reagan, block grants allow for flexibility on the State and local level in meeting existing needs. My bill will allow States to become more capable of targeting resources to the programs most needed in the State and communities.

The success of the State and local combined efforts is clearly exemplified in South Dakota. A large farm implement manufacturing firm in Mitchell had a critical need for 40 additional welders. The Mitchell Area Vocational Technical School was able to promptly respond to this need by training people in the evenings and on weekends.

Another local manufacturer had a need for specialized welders. The Mitchell Vo-Tech School was able to respond by taking one of company's employees and providing short-term intensive training programs in MIG and TIG welding.

These are two examples of this one school's effective response to the business and employment needs of the community. What does the school get in return? Local businesses and industries have played a major role in the development of Mitchell Vo-Tech by donating hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of equipment to the school. Currently, over 100 businesses and industry leaders serve as advisers to the school. The farm implement company I mentioned earlier located in Mitchell because of the availability of the Mitchell Vo-Tech School.

Through coordination with State and local education agencies, students receive valuable experience and industry is able to hire skilled workers. In this instance and countless others, education and industry cooperatively recognize and respond to training and manpower needs. South Dakota's 90 percent in-State placement rate for postsecondary voc-ed graduates is proof that the programs are working.

Statistics show employers are satisfied with workers trained by voc-ed institutions. Voc-ed programs are meeting the need not only of students, but also of the communities in which the graduates are employed.

I have long believed that vocational education offers one of the most effective means by which our country can better prepare its work force and effectively utilize the talents and resources of its people. My very first speech in Congress in 1975 was about the need for strengthening vocational education in this Nation. I have continued that fight in the U.S. Senate. I support speedy reauthorization of the Vocational Education Act and I urge my colleagues to join in better focusing, redefining and refining congressional intent in the Vocational Education Act.

By Mr. GRASSLEY (for himself, Mr. EAGLETON, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. PELL, Mr. DENTON, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. PERCY, Mr. COHEN, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. GLENN, Mr. EAST, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. WARNER, Mr. DOMENICI, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. DOLE, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. DODD, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. JEPSEN, and Mr. WILSON):

S. 2603. A bill to extend the authorization of appropriations for, and to revise the Older Americans Act of 1965, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

OLDER AMERICANS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1984

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, today it is my pleasure along with 32 cosponsors (Senators EAGLETON, HAWKINS, PELL, DENTON, METZENBAUM, THURMOND, KENNEDY, HEINZ, D'AMATO, PERCY, COHEN, BURDICK, MELCHER, GLENN, EAST, MATSUNAGA, WARNER, DOMENICI, KASSEBAUM, STAFFORD, PRYOR, DOLE, PRESSLER, DURENBERGER, WALLOP, RANDOLPH, RIEGLE, DODD, BINGAMAN, COCHRAN, JEPSEN, and WILSON), to introduce legislation reauthorizing the Older Americans Act for another 3 years. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Aging of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, it has been my pleasure to work with the ranking minority member, Senator EAGLETON, in a bipartisan effort that has brought forth this bill for the consideration of the Senate. It is, I think, a bill that refines, updates, and clarifies a law that has served the Nation's older population well. The members of the subcommittee, Senators HAWKINS, DENTON, THURMOND, METZENBAUM, and PELL have contributed immeasurably as have the leadership of the full committee.

This reauthorization addresses the rising problem of Alzheimer's disease and its effect on victims and their families; faces the realities of elder abuse and its heartbreak without mandating intrusive practices by the States; mandates and funds a program for all 50 States that puts an emphasis on health maintenance and illness prevention through nutrition, exercise, and drug education; and maintains increased authorization funding levels for all titles of the Older Americans Act through the 3-year authorization period.

This reauthorization does not move any title V community service employment programs from the Department of Labor; mandate 100 percent consolidation of title III (B) and (C) funding; call for moving commodities funding from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Health and Human Services; set up a means test for participants in Older Americans Act programs nor does it increase the present age limit of 60 for title III services.

The decision to amend or not was made by the committee based on testimony received in a series of six hearings conducted since the first of the year; as well as meetings with interested aging organizations and correspondence from Senators and State officials.

As marked up by the subcommittee, the bill makes two minor amendments dealing with age discrimination in employment—one affecting Americans working for American corporations overseas, the second raises the income level for corporate classification.

Mr. President, this is a bill that I believe many of our colleagues will want to support. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill to reauthorize and amend the Older Americans Act be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2603

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) this Act may be cited as the "Older Americans Act Amendments of 1984".

● Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the distinguished chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Aging and a number of my other colleagues in introducing the Older Americans Act Amendments of 1984.

The Older Americans Act, first enacted in 1965, represents the only Federal social services program solely directed toward improving the lives of our senior citizens.

Demographic data on age changes in our society dramatically highlight the fact that one of the most significant demographic facts affecting American society is the aging of its population. The number of elderly persons has grown and, for the next 50 years, will continue to grow more rapidly that the total population. In 1982, 11 percent of all Americans were aged 65 and over; by the year 2025, a projected 19 percent of the total population will be elderly. These statistics represent a significant triumph for our society in terms of our standard of living and advances in medical science, but they bring with them an increasing responsibility to assist elderly individuals to live their lives with dignity.

Contrary to the widespread view, only about 5 percent of the elderly population live in nursing homes. Almost three-fourths of nursing home residents are without a spouse, compared with just over 40 percent of the noninstitutionalized elderly. The data strongly suggests that the absence of family or other support mechanisms to provide health and maintenance requirements is the most critical factor in the institutionalization of an elderly person.

It is this concern with providing support for health and maintenance requirements of older individuals to which the Older Americans Act addresses itself. Its basic framework of a network of State and area agencies on aging seeks to provide a wide range of services, including transportation, home health care, homemaker services, escort and shopping services, outreach, home repair, elder abuse prevention, legal counseling, and other services to senior citizens. All of these services are designed to allow senior citizens to maintain maximum independence and remain within their own communities.

The bill which we are introducing today maintains and strengthens the basic structures of the Older Americans Act. While we have modified and altered the provisions of the act over the last 19 years, and we make further minor modifications today, it is my view that they have contributed to strengthening and coordinating systems of services reaching into every community, making possible a broad range of nutrition, access, health, and supportive services for elderly individuals. This act has proven itself worthy of our continued support and its program components deserve to be maintained even in these times of fiscal austerity.

Let me briefly highlight the major changes from existing law contained in the bill we are presenting today:

First: Federal Council on Aging. The bill amends the requirement for membership of the Federal Council of Aging. Current law requires that the Council be composed of 15 members appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The bill still requires that the membership be 15, but a portion are appointed by the President, a portion by the President pro tempore of the Senate, and a portion by the Speaker of the House.

Second: Evaluation. Current law authorizes the Secretary to use up to 1 percent of the funds under the act or $1 million, whichever is greater, to conduct program evaluation. The bill limits the amount of funding for evaluation to one-tenth of 1 percent of the funds appropriated under the act or $300,000, whichever is lower. This amount reflects the committee's concern about the manner in which funds have been used, particularly the Department's siphoning off Older Americans Act money for evaluation of programs not in the field of aging and for support of administrative activities of the Department.

Third: Intrastate funding formulas. The bill clarifies existing law's requirement that each State publish its intrastate funding formula by requiring that the formulas, and the manner in which the formulas were arrived at be disclosed with sufficient detail that the public can better understand the formula in order to be able to comment intelligently.

Fourth: New authority with respect to Alzheimer's disease. The committee bill amends title III of the act to require each area agency on aging to give priority funding of supportive services for families of older persons with Alzheimer's disease. The idea behind this amendment is to provide in-home care and respite care for Alzheimer's victims and their families so that family care givers can have an alternative to institutionalizing the patient.

In addition, the bill establishes a new priority demonstration program under title IV of the act for projects related to services to older individuals with Alzheimer's disease and their families.

Fifth: Transfer of funds between supportive services and nutrition services. Current law allows States to tranfer up to 20 percent of its funds for supportive and nutrition services between these two separate allotments. The bill increases the allowable percentage transfer from 20 to 35 percent. During the past 2 years, States have increasingly transferred funds between the programs, and the bill is intended to increase State flexibility in the use of these moneys.

Sixth: Waiver authority. Current law allows the area agencies to request a waiver from the States with respect to the priority services—transportation, in-home services, and legal services; the bill adds Alzheimer's as a priority service—if the area agency can demonstrate that the priority service need is being met in the area. The bill requires the area agency to hold a public hearing on the issue of a waiver of any of the priority services prior to applying to the State for the waiver, and requires that the record of the public hearing be reviewed by the State prior to granting any such waiver.

Seventh: Elder abuse. The bill adds a new category of supportive service under title III dealing with elderly abuse. It would give States and area agencies authority to review complaints and provide referral services to elderly suffering from family, usually spouse, abuse.

Eighth: State administration. The committee bill increases the amount available for State administration activities by upping the State minimum and allowing State administrative funds as a percentage of the overall appropriation of title III, rather than as a separate line item subject to appropriations.

Ninth: Surplus commodities. The bill requires that States submit final reimbursement claims for meals within 90 days after the quarter for which the reimbursement is requested. This tracks language now included as a part of the agriculture appropriations bill and is aimed at requiring States to improve their reporting on claims for reimbursement.

Tenth: Title IV, training, research, and demonstration programs. The bill adds a statement of purpose for title IV, placing priority on education and training of personnel to work with older persons, research and development, demonstration activities, and dissemination of information on aging.

Eleventh: Long term care gerontology centers. The bill adds a new provision with respect to all the demonstration programs that they be developed and administered in conjunction with the regional long term care gerontology centers, where appropriate.

Twelfth: Title V, older worker employment. The bill adds a new provision placing a 12-percent administrative cap on the amount of title V funds which can be used for administrative costs. Existing law does not contain any legislatively imposed cap, although Labor Department regulations set that cap at 15 percent. The 12 percent is based on data compiled by GAO indicating that the average percentage of Federal funds used for administrative expenses by all the contractors was 11 percent for 1982–83. Because of a concern raised that the cap might create hardship for the minority contractors who do not have the economy of scale of some of the larger contractors, the effective date of this administrative cap was pushed forward a year to July 1, 1985.

Thirteenth: Authorizations. Authorization levels for 1985, 1986, and 1987, generally, reflect CBO current services levels based on the actual fiscal year 1984 appropriations. The two major exceptions are title III–B supportive services and title IV training, research, and demonstrations. In each of the above programs, the increase exceeds current services levels to reflect the committee's view that increased activities need to be undertaken.

I ask unanimous consent that a chart showing the authorization levels for aging programs be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator GRASSLEY, the distinguished chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Aging, in cosponsoring legislation to reauthorize the Older Americans Act. The Older Americans Act has, since its enactment in 1965, served to unite the Federal, State, and local levels in providing essential services to our elderly. This act has been amended nine times since 1965, each time expanding its advocacy and its services. Its funding has also grown, from an original appropriation of $7.5 million to over $1 billion in fiscal year 1984. The Older Americans Act has also been a key force in attracting resources from the private sector to address the needs of our older population.

A constituent in Jacksonville, Fla., best summed up the value of the Older Americans Act; she wrote:

> The Older Americans Act has brought recognition to the American senior citizen that no other program has been able to accomplish. The Senior Employment program, I have seen firsthand, has given pride and a feeling of self-worth to the senior who finds employment and becomes a contributor to our work force. Nutrition programs facilitate a wholesome meal for the senior. The communities need more funds to provide transportation to the meal site . . . and homebound services. In essence, funds for the Older Americans Act are well spent, fiscally sound, and highly beneficial to the senior.

Mr. President, all of us in Congress recognize the value and importance of this program, and we seek expeditious passage of legislation to reauthorize it. I hope that it can be enacted before May, which is Older American's Month. Since this reauthorization process gives Congress the opportunity to improve the programs under the Older Americans Act, however, Senator GRASSLEY held extensive hearings in his Subcommittee on Aging. Testimony presented at these hearings clearly demonstrates the need for continued Federal funding for existing programs and also indicated areas where priority should be given. For example, Senator D'AMATO and Representative OLYMPIA SNOWE testified on the need to include in the Older Americans Act authority for services for elderly victims of Alzheimer's disease. Their eloquent testimony on the difficulties faced by these victims and their families prompted the subcommittee to include provisions in the act to authorize funding for training of health professionals who will specialize in the custodial or skilled care of Alzheimer victims. Also, the subcommittee included provisions requiring area agencies on aging to give priority to funding community support programs serving the families of Alzheimer's victims.

Another issue addressed in this reauthorization bill is the growing problem of elderly abuse. This problem has prompted the Attorney General of the United States to convene a task force to look into the problem of family violence and to make recommendations to Congress. In addition, Senator DENTON, chairman of the Subcommittee on Family, has stated that his subcommittee will hold hearings on domestic violence, including abuse of the elderly. The Older Americans Act has been amended to reflect our growing concern regarding the need to identify the extent of the problem and assure the availability of adequate prevention and treatment services for elderly abuse. Also, the act will require the State to identify the existing public and private entities involved in this area, determine the extent of unmet needs, and establish programs in those areas where services do not exist.

An issue that was debated before the Subcommittee on Aging but incorporated into a separate bill pending before the full Labor and Human Resources Committee was the need for additional community support programs for the frail elderly. I believe we must make an extra effort to reach this group of vulnerable older Americans. Poverty and poor health can isolate the elderly and defeat the purpose of the Older Americans Act. Therefore, I was pleased that the committee favorably reported S. 2301, which incorporates a provision authorizing the expenditure of $150 million in fiscal year 1986 and $200 million in fiscal year 1987 for community-based home health services for the elderly. This provision would provide basic in-home support services, such as a visiting homemaker or health aide, and adult day care or occupational or respiratory therapy to those elderly who are at risk of institutionalization. These services, which enable the frail elderly to avoid premature or unnecessary institutionalization, can result in enormous cost savings over the long run. Fortunately, Congress is beginning to recognize the value of home care for the elderly and disabled, but more needs to be done. Preventing unnecessary institutionalization is crucial to the well-being of the elderly, and it is particularly important in States like Florida, which have large elderly populations.

Mr. President, this reauthorization legislation represents a belief held by a majority of our colleagues that the Older Americans Act is worthwhile and should be continued. It also represents our commitment to continual improvement of programs serving our elderly citizens. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of it. The elderly are more grateful than many of us realize; in the words of one of my constituents: "Thanks for your very good work on the Older Americans Act. I think it's great. God bless you for all that you are doing for us shut-ins. We love you."●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor the Older Americans Act Amendments of 1984, a 3-year reauthorization of the the Older Americans Act which is designed to meet the social needs of or senior citizens.

Even though there are other Federal programs that assist the elderly the Older Americans Act is the most comprehensive vehicle for the organization and delivery of services to the aged needy. This act, created in Congress in 1965, has developed from a program of small grants to a major social service provider. By 1983, there were over 650 home-delivered nutrition centers, and over 54,000 community service jobs.

Of the six titles of the Older Americans Act, title III, IV, and V, are the most crucial. Title III grants moneys to State agencies on aging to organize nutritional (Meals on Wheels) and supportive services. Title IV authorizes moneys for training, research, and demonstration programs. Title V, the Community Service Employment program for older Americans, subsidizes part-time community service jobs for unemployed, low-income persons over the age of 55.

I want to commend my close friend and colleague, Senator GRASSLEY, for the fine work he has done on this bill. He has shown his deep understanding of the problems that face the elderly. In this legislation, he has successfully struck a balance between the needs of the elderly and the constraints of budget limitations.

I am especially supportive of this reauthorization of the Older Americans Act because of its streamlined approach to old and new problems. One of the new problems that the elderly fear is Alzheimer's disease. Alzheimer's disease costs this Nation over $25 billion annually. Up to 1 million are believed to be affected, 5 percent of those over 65 years of age. It is believed that over a quarter of all nursing home patients have Alzheimer's disease.

When the Alzheimer's disease sufferer is not in a nursing home, it is the family which must provide much of the assistance. There is now little assistance, however, for the family. The proposals within this legislation will address this matter.

Under title IV of this act, support will be given for training personnel to provide better care of those afflicted with Alzheimer's disease and related neurological disorders. The availability and commitment of qualified persons to provide quality care to Alzheimer's disease sufferers will be increased. It is just as important to provide services for the victims of Alzheimer's disease as it is to provide respite services for their families. This legislation is an excellent step toward comprehensive respite services for the elderly.

I want the sponsors of this important legislation to know that, as a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I will do my best to work for full appropriations of the Older Americans Act. I hope my colleagues will do the same.●

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this legislation to reauthorize the Older Americans Act. The bill we are introducing today will strengthen the act and provide additional benefits to our Nation's senior citizens.

With passage of the Older Americans Act in 1965, Congress created a new Federal program specifically designed to meet the social service needs of older persons, The act has been amended 10 times since 1965 and has grown from an original program of small grants into one which now supports an organized network of 57 State units on aging, 662 area agencies on aging, and 25,000 local nutrition and supportive service providers. The budget for the Older Americans Act has increased from $7.5 million in 1966 to over $1 billion in 1984. The act is the major vehicle for the organization and delivery of services to older Americans.

During 1983, an estimated 9.1 million older Americans were served by title III supportive services. The nutrition programs served an estimated 203 million meals, and 300,000 volunteers, many of them elderly, augmented the efforts of paid staff. In addition to providing for basic social and nutritional needs, the act supports other important services at the local level, including employment, counseling, home health care, transportation, adult day care, information, and referral, and legal services. Services are provided to all seniors regardless of income, but the law places a special emphasis on those in "greatest social or economic need." The Older Americans Act has grown to meet its objective to promote among older Americans "freedom, independence, and the free exercise of individual initiative in planning and managing their own lives."

The legislation we are introducing today will reauthorize the Older Americans Act for an additional 3 years; and it includes several new provisions to benefit older Americans, their families, and their communities. The bill requires area agencies on aging to expend an adequate proportion of title III-B funds on the delivery of services for the prevention of elder abuse. Under this new provision, States would establish a program for public education to prevent and identify elder abuse, receiving reports of elder abuse, and information and referral. These programs would be established consistent with relevant State law and coordinated with existing State adult protective service activities.

The bill also provides for the establishment of demonstration projects under title III in health and nutrition education. These projects would be designed to improve the health and nutrition of older Americans by increasing their physical fitness activities and improving the nutritional value of their meals at home. These projects would be established and administered in consultation with the appropriate long-term care gerontology center. Title IV of the act is amended to provide priority training to persons engaged in the provision of supportive services to victims of Alzheimer's disease and their families. Authorization levels for the act will allow programs to continue at current service levels, with modest growth in several titles.

I enthusiastically support the Older Americans Act and recognize the valuable role it plays in furthering the independence and self-sufficiency of many of our older citizens. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation to reauthorize the Older Americans Act.

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, it has been over 19 years since the enactment of the Older Americans Act of 1965. During that time, we have seen the program grow from a few small social service grants and research projects to a network of over 1,500 individual community service projects serving older persons. These programs have been capably administered by 57 State and territorial units on aging through a complex network of over 670 locally based area agencies on aging. While the budget for these programs in 1966 was $5.7 million, more than $1 billion are committed to them in the current fiscal year.

Since the enactment of this important piece of legislation, the Federal response to the needs of the elderly has been significant. Twenty years ago the poverty rate among older Americans was 33 percent. There was no medicare, medicaid, title XX, or food stamps. A national focus on the special needs and problems of older persons had just begun to emerge shortly after the first White House Conference on Aging in 1961. In 1960, less than 15 percent of the Federal budget was spent on the elderly, and almost all of this spending was in the form of retirement benefits. Since then, the share of the budget spent on the elderly has nearly doubled. In part, this was due to the fact that increasing numbers of older Americans have received improved social security benefits as the system matured.

A more significant cause of this increase, however, was legislated improvements in income protection, health insurance and services which were enacted in the late 1960's and the early 1970's in an effort to reduce high rates of poverty among the elderly. Today, that rate has been cut by more than half, and older Americans at every economic level are more economically secure, enjoy better access to health care, and have a wide range of community services available to support their independence.

Mr. President, as chairman of the Special Committee on Aging, I have worked to improve the functioning of our income, health, housing, and services programs. The Older Americans Act was not intended to meet all the needs of older people, nor can it reasonably by expected to do so. The act is designed to promote social functioning and not, for example, income maintenance. Its first purpose is to assist all older people to be part of the mainstream of American society. Its second purpose is to assist those older persons who are frail in receiving the support they require to live with dignity.

During the past several months, the Senate Aging Committees have held several hearings designed to examine the success of this program in meeting its goals and to receive recommendations for setting new policy directions. In addition, the national aging organizations have done an excellent job at both assessing the progress and examining the shortcomings of the Older Americans Act. We have appreciated their input.

Based on this oversight effort, I do not believe that this is the appropriate time for a major overhaul of the act. Our experience since the 1981 amendments is that the act is working reasonably well. Older persons are indeed benefiting from Older American Act programs that operate in their communities.

The comments we have received on the act, however, indicate that certain additional minor adjustments would contribute to the effectiveness of the legislation. The legislation we are introducing today, I believe, will accomplish this objective. Among other things the bill will strengthen the appointment procedure for members of the Federal Council on Aging, improve supportive services for families of older individuals with Alzheimers disease, focus attention on issues related to elder abuse, enhance the coordination of the senior community service employment program, and expand resources for additional research and training in the field of aging. These are important and significant improvements.

I have appreciated the opportunity to work along with my distinguished colleague, Senator GRASSLEY, in helping to develop realistic legislative recommendations for strengthening the Older Americans Act. I am pleased to be a cosponsor to this measure, and commend both Senators GRASSLEY and EAGLETON and the staff of the Subcommittee on Aging for their excellent work in formulating this bill.

Mr. President, the goals of the Older Americans Act have been reaffirmed each time the Congress has reauthorized the act. I believe that the suggestions incorporated in this reauthorization bill will further enhance the achievement of those goals which we have set before us.●

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am happy to join Senators GRASSLEY and EAGLETON in introducing the reauthorization of the Older Americans Act, OAA. Senators GRASSLEY and EAGLETON and their staffs have worked hard to hammer out a most comprehensive piece of legislation. I commend them for their dedication and for the fine work they have produced.

I want to reaffirm my support for the Older Americans Act and the programs it authorizes. As the greying of America continues, we will need the continuum of opportunities, services, and care for older people at the community level that the act is designed to bring about. As attorney general of my State of New Mexico, I was able to observe firsthand the service delivery systems progressively performed by our New Mexico State Agency on Aging. The participation and the involvement of the local communities and the assembling of networks to perform these duties have been exemplary.

The reauthorizing of the Older Americans Act is just the beginning of our task in the years ahead. First, we must overcome the negative stereotypes about older people that have helped drive many into forced retirement, denying them the opportunity to remain active, self-sufficient members of the society. We need to begin development of more flexible work and retirement policies, allowing older Americans who want to remain in the work force a variety of options for phased in or gradual retirement.

Second, we must insure that adequate assistance and support services, such as housing, health care, and income assistance are available for all older Americans who need them. Despite the tremendous successes in the past several decades in reducing poverty among them, inadequate incomes and resources continue to be devastating problems for millions of elderly people. The native American elderly are perhaps the most underserved group subjected to poverty and inadequate incomes.

The Senate may want to consider during our deliberation of the reauthorization of Older Americans Act the issue of targeting. Without targeting of funds to address the needs of poor, disabled, and disadvantage, the Older Americans Act will not serve those most in need. I suggest, therefore, that the language in section 305(a)(2)(E) of the act should remain the same, or the old language targeting the poor and minorities should be revised.

Mr. President, I am firmly committed to maintaining the strength of this vital program, as well as the adequacy of its benefits. I support the passage of this legislation and urge my colleagues to express their support as well.●

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, senior citizens are among the most valuable resources that this country possesses. I am therefore very proud to join with the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Aging, Senator GRASSLEY, and my fellow members of the subcommittee and the full Committee on Labor and Human Resources today in introducing the bill which will reauthorize the Older Americans Act for another 3 years.

No State offers a better example of the value of the Older Americans Act than my State of Rhode Island. One-quarter of our population, or more than 230,000 individuals, is over the age of 55. More than 40,000 of them last year took advantage of the senior centers, meals sites, Meals on Wheels, community service jobs, or other services provided by the Older Americans Act in Rhode Island.

The result of these services is better health, more community involvement, and a greater sense of well-being. No activity of the Federal Government is more meaningful or valuable to the senior citizens of my State than the Older Americans Act.

One of the remarkable aspects of this act is the stability and efficiency with which the programs operate. The comprehensive and thoughtful hearings on reauthorization assembled by Chairman GRASSLEY and his staff revealed no major shortcomings, no waste of Government money, and no need for large changes in the act. The hearings did reveal opportunities for minor but important improvements in the act and its programs, and many of those areas have been addressed by the reauthorization bill that is introduced today.

I would like to mention, Mr. President, several areas of improvement which have been of particular interest to me. These subjects came up during the subcommittee hearing which I was fortunate to chair in Rhode Island, and in testimony presented during hearings here in Washington. In each of these areas, the subcommittee chairman and other subcommittee members have been most cooperative in accepting amendments that I have proposed. The amendments would not carry the strength and value that they do were it not for my colleagues interest in them.

The first area concerns education for seniors in personal health and nutrition. One of the most valuable functions that any social service program can perform is that of teaching people how to improve their physical well-being. The task is difficult, however, because all of us as adults have great difficulty in altering the habits and patterns of daily living that we have constructed over the years. Congregate meal sites funded under title III-C of the Older Americans Act, for example, may include nutrition education as part of their daily activities. A 1983 study by Kirschner Associates and the Opinion Research Corp. for the Administration on Aging found, however, that "nutrition education activities offered by meal sites have no discernible impact upon participants' dietary intakes away from the site." A study by Associate Professor Phyllis Brown of the University of Rhode Island arrived at the same conclusion.

Simple means exist, nonetheless, for improved education and daily practices. Dr. Sidney Katz, director of the Southeastern New England Long-Term Care Gerontology Center at Brown University, has stated for example that improved physical fitness is possible just by making daily tasks a bit harder, rather than easier, to do. One example would be that of putting boxes and cans in the kitchen on higher shelves, so that a longer reach is necessary to get to them.

The amendment I have proposed, which was accepted by the chairman and the other members of the subcommittee, would therefore require each of the States to develop new and innovative demonstration projects in health and nutrition education. Improved techniques which can be developed for teaching and retention of necessary changes in daily habits will aid all of us eventually by promoting longer and healthier lives.

The second area of improvement, Mr. President, concerns the prevention of elderly abuse. Physical, emotional, and financial abuse of the elderly has been a subject of growing concern within our country for several years, but Congress has not yet fully responded. I was shocked to discover recently as a result of a 3-year Administration on Aging demonstration project on elder abuse in my own State of Rhode Island, that the level of physical abuse of frail seniors was far higher than anyone had imagined, and in some cases was life-threatening. Massachusetts and New York, also conducted demonstration grants, and discovered similar patterns. Hearings by the Senate Special Committee on Aging and the House Select Committee on Aging in 1979 and 1980 have provided documentation of the existence of this tragic problem, and at different times the Senator from California, Senator CRANSTON, the Senator from Pennsylvania, Senator HEINZ, and Representative MARY ROSE OAKAR of Ohio, have sought legislative solutions. To date, none of their efforts have been fully approved by Congress.

The amendment I have proposed will require the aging network to respond to this problem by using the social services that it is so skilled at providing. Public education, receipt of complaints, discussions with the parties, and referral to other sources of help are all activities that State and local areas of aging are well familiar with, and the Older Americans Act will now insure that these activities are provided with respect to elderly abuse. I am particularly grateful to the Senator from Alabama, Mr. DENTON, for his cooperation in drafting mutually acceptable provisions, and I would also like to thank the chairman of the full committee, Mr. HATCH, and the Senator from Missouri, Mr. EAGLETON, for their help.

One further area of improvement has concerned the "targeting" provisions of the Older Americans Act. The minority elderly have historically possessed a greater need for services because of their greater poverty, yet the level of services that they have received has not reflected this reality. I am thankful that the chairman, Mr. GRASSLEY, has accepted my amendment so that minorities will be specifically mentioned in the language targeting services to the economically and socially needy.

Mr. President, the Older Americans Act is an important example of the ability of our Federal Government to respond to a need for assistance and services on the part of a group of the Nation's people. The drafting and assembly of this reauthorization further exemplifies that responsiveness, and I compliment the subcommittee chairman, Mr. GRASSLEY, and the ranking minority member, Mr. EAGLETON, for their work and success. I look forward to swift passage, signing, and implementation of this bill.●

S.J. Res. 283. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the week of May 7, 1984, as "National Arson Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL ARSON AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am pleased to introduce, along with 18 of my distinguished colleagues, a joint resolution designating the week of May 7, 1984, as "National Arson Awareness Week."

Arson is a universal crime, quite diverse in its scope and complexity. It is a street crime, a white-collar crime, a terrorist crime, a crime against property, and a crime against persons. It is carried out by both the rational and the irrational mind, by children, by the elderly, and by persons of both sexes.

According to statistics of the U.S. Fire Administration, one out of four fires is of suspicious origin. In the 1970's, arson was one of the fastest growing crimes. In every State of this Nation, arson is taking the lives, the health, and the money of innocent people. All of us pay for these arson fires through higher insurance rates.

Arson is deadly and costly. Each year approximately 900 people are killed and 4,000 persons are injured in arson-originated fires. Each such fire averages over $6,000 in property loss. Annually, direct property loss from arson totals $1.2 billion and indirect property loss from arson totals $15 billion. Almost 40 percent of the wildfires in the Southern States are incendiary in nature. These wildfires destroy approximately 350 million feet of wood annually. This is over half the total acreage loss due to fire.

Arson is primarily a local problem. Only when it is committed against Government-owned property, when it involves violations of Federal law, or when it is used against property affecting interstate or foreign commerce does arson become a Federal crime.

Arson is an intentional crime and is, therefore, avoidable. However, the complexity of arson makes it difficult to recognize and prevent. There are usually no witnesses to the crime, and much of the evidence is burned up. There is a low risk of apprehension and imprisonment. Also, the traditional roles of policemen, firemen, local prosecutors, and insurance personnel often hamper arson control and prevention.

We, the Members of this body, addressed the issue of arson in the 97th Congress when we passed the Anti-Arson Act of 1982, Public Law 97-298, and again in this Congress in title X, part M, of S. 1762, which passed the Senate overwhelmingly by a vote of 91 to 1. That is not enough. We must make all Americans aware of the arson problem, its impact on each of us, and the community resources available to us in the event we are victims of arson. Accordingly, I am introducing a joint resolution to designate the week of May 7, 1984, as "National Arson Awareness Week."

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 283

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Whereas one of every four fires is of suspicious origin, according to statistics of the U.S. Fire Administration;

Whereas death caused by arson has increased dramatically over the last ten years;

Whereas no other fire cause has exceeded arson in total dollar loss;

Whereas the crime of arson is associated with high profits and a low risk of apprehension and imprisonment;

Whereas the complexity of arson makes it a difficult crime to recognize and prevent; and

Whereas we need to create an awareness of arson, its impact on each of us, and the community resources available to us in the event that we are the victims of arson: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of May 7, 1984, as "National Arson Awareness Week," and to call upon Federal, State, and local government agencies, and the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies and activities.

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself, Mr. PELL, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. DODD, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. CHILES):

S.J. Res. 284. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning September 2, 1984, as "National School-Age Child Care Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL SCHOOL-AGE CHILD CARE AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today, I am introducing a joint resolution designating the week beginning September 2, 1984, as "National School-Age Child Care Awareness Week." This is a companion to the resolution offered by Representative JOHN MCKERNAN, JR., of Maine in the House of Representatives.

Although the need for child care for school-age children is not new, the demand for such care is increasing. Over the past three decades, the dramatic increase in two working parent families and working single heads of households has left millions of school-age children without adult company for significant periods of time each day. In factories and offices throughout our country, parents wait anxiously for their children to call and confirm their safe arrival at home. They hope that their children can take care of themselves for the 2 or 3 hours between the end of the school day and the time when they return home from work. Yet, what do we know about children in self-care, and what is happening to them? In June of last year, the Senate Children's Caucus conducted a policy forum on children in self-care and found that the risks to these children are substantial. The research suggests that children in self-care run greater physical and psychological risks, including accidents and feelings of fear and loneliness, than children who are cared for by an adult. In my home State of Michigan, for example, fire officials in Detroit estimate that one in six fires is caused by a child at home alone.

Some parents and communities have recognized the need for school-age child care and are developing programs for children before and after school. Additionally, traditional family and youth organizations, such as the Y, Campfire, and Boys Club, have developed similar programs for these children. Yet despite these efforts, estimates suggest that as many as 6 to 7 million school-age children may be in self-care each day. Clearly, Mr. President, much more needs to be done to protect our most valuable natural resource, our children.

Last year, I introduced, along with Senator PELL, the School Facilities Child Care Act, S. 1531, which authorizes $15 million a year for 3 years for grants to public and nonprofit organizations to operate school-age child care programs in public schools. Through the use of existing public school facilities, this legislation represents a commonsense and cost-effective approach to child care for school-age children. Many agree with this assessment as nearly 30 organizations have endorsed this legislation and 19 of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle in the Senate are cosponsors.

It is my hope that through this joint resolution I am introducing today, we will generate a greater public awareness of the problems facing children in self-care, and I urge my colleagues to join me by cosponsoring this joint resolution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 284

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Whereas more than half of the children in the United States are in families in which both parents are in the work force;

Whereas more than one in five children in the United States are in a one-parent family;

Whereas changes in the composition of American families and the American work force have resulted in an increased demand for child care for children of all ages;

Whereas the demand for child care for school-age children has increased at a greater rate than the availability of school-age child care;

Whereas estimates show that millions of school-age children between the ages of six and thirteen, often referred to as latchkey children, may return alone after school to an empty house or in the supervision of a slightly older brother or sister;

Whereas research studies have indicated that children in self and sibling care run greater physical and psychological risks, including accidents and feelings of fear and loneliness, than children who are cared for by an adult;

Whereas the Congress has begun to examine the issue of child care and the role of Federal and State government, the private sector, and parents in providing child care;

Whereas the parents, communities, employers, and agencies serving youth that have recognized the shortage of adequate and affordable school-age child care have developed after school programs for children in their communities; and

Whereas many more parents, communities, employers, and agencies serving youth need to address the problems facing these children and to maximize the use of State and Federal resources in collaboration with these efforts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning September 2, 1984, is hereby designated as "National School-Age Child Care Awareness Week" and the President is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate programs and activities.

SENATE RESOLUTION 373—RELATING TO THE FREE FLOW OF TRAVEL LITERATURE FROM THE UNITED STATES

Mr. PRESSLER (for himself, Mr. WARNER, Mr. SASSER, and Mr. LEAHY) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

S. RES. 373

Whereas Americans travelling abroad represent a significant source of income to the countries they visit and foreign visitors to the United States make significant contributions to domestic interstate commerce;

Whereas the benefits of international tourism are maximized by the free exchange of travel literature on a worldwide basis;

Whereas a 9 per cent surcharge is levied on travel literature sent into Canada from the United States, while there is no such fee on promotional travel literature sent by Canada into the United States;

Whereas this type of travel literature, which describes tourist attractions in the United States, is distributed free of charge on a worldwide basis;

Whereas the United States travel and tourism industry and the United States economy are adversely affected by any restriction on promoting travel opportunities in the United States; and

Whereas previous attempts to restore the ability of the United States travel and tourism industry freely to promote United States travel destinations have been unsuccessful: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the President should direct the Secretary of Commerce to seek the discontinuance of practices that restrict the free flow of travel literature to Canada from the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce is urged to present this issue to the Tourism Policy Council, pursuant to the requirements of the National Tourism Policy Act (22 U.S.C. 2121 et seq.), and seek the Council's recommended course of action.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, it is with some reluctance that I rise to submit this measure, since it concerns a problem that should have never surfaced, and most certainly should have been resolved by other means.

Last year, our close neighbor and ally, Canada, imposed a 9-percent tax on travel literature imported from the United States. Since the imposition of this tax, our Government has tried, unsuccessfully, to convince the Canadian Government to remove this unfair infringement upon our ability to promote U.S. travel destinations within Canada. I submit this resolution today in the hope that a clear statement by the Senate will help to resolve this unfortunate problem.

This tax is unfair for several reasons. First of all, the literature that is being taxed is not sold in Canada, but distributed free of charge to educate Canadians about travel opportunities in the United States, such as those in my home State of South Dakota.

Second, there is no similar tax imposed on Canadian travel literature brought into the United States, nor should there be. I believe that international travel contributes so greatly to worldwide good will and intercultural appreciation that all nations should be allowed to freely promote their travel destinations throughout the world. I fear that a movement to impose a reciprocal tax might gain momentum if this situation is not quickly resolved, and I do not think any of us view retaliation as an appropriate solution.

Also, Mr. President, visitors to Canada from the United States account for approximately two-thirds of Canada's tourism revenues. This Senator cannot conceive of any reason why Canada would initiate barriers to our mutual ability to freely promote our travel destinations within each other's borders.

In conclusion, I must point out that our Government has thus far been very patient with the Canadians. Although efforts by officials of both the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration and the Department of State have yet to resolve this situation, no one has proposed the imposition of a reciprocal tax.

My hope is that the matter can be resolved without retaliatory measures, and I ask my colleagues to join me in urging the President to direct the appropriate members of his Cabinet to renew efforts aimed at eliminating this tax.

Already, the Senate Tourism Caucus has sent a letter to the Secretary of State, signed by 15 Senators, calling this problem to his attention. I hope that this resolution will bring more pressure to bear and will help bring about the only fair solution.

MATTINGLY AMENDMENT NO. 3033

At the end of amendment No. 3029, insert the following:

It is the sense of the Senate that:

One, federal spending currently exceeds three-fourths of a trillion dollars and, according to the Congressional Budget Office, will surpass the trillion dollar a year level before the end of this decade; and

Two, an ever-growing share of the federal budget is uncontrollable; and

Three, since 1970, as a percentage of gross national product, federal receipts and federal outlays have averaged 19.2 percent and 21.9 percent of GNP respectively; and

Four, detailed examination of historical trends point to expenditure growth as the real culprit of our ever-diminishing ability to balance the federal government's books; and

Five, the obvious result of this economic imbalance is persistent deficits; and

Six, deficits do matter, for they signal something is fundamentally wrong with the trend in government spending; and

Seven, the continued increase in federal spending results in large budget deficits; and

Eight, large budget deficits cause a rise in interest rates and inflation and can choke off the current economic recovery; and

Nine, a National Commission Federal Spending Reform, similar to the National Commission on Social Security Reform, should be established to study the growth in federal spending and report to the Congress after January 1, 1985, on those steps Congress might consider for the purpose of reforming federal spending programs and curbing their growth in an effort to regain control of the federal budget and reduce the federal deficit; and

(a) be composed of distinguished leaders from the executive and legislative branches of government, business, labor, and education, and

(b) consult with other private and public sector experts for recommendations about reforms that would best address existing problems.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

LOW-INCOME HOUSING: A GROWING CRISIS

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, in recent years the National Low Income Housing Coalition has gained a brilliant national reputation as one of the most effective organizations supporting decent housing for low and moderate income Americans. The Coalition's reputation is in large degree a tribute to the knowledge and skillful efforts of its president, Cushing Dolbeare and chairman, our former colleague, Ed Brooke.

Mr. President, I want to call my colleagues attention to testimony presented by Cushing Dolbeare before the House Committee on Appropriations.

Her analysis reviews the effects of the President's fiscal year 1985 budget in light of national housing needs. It provides additional evidence that this administration has consistently used administrative action and spending cuts to drastically reduce Federal support for decent housing for our most needy citizens.

She points out that 7.5 million households are in need of decent, affordable housing. In 1980, 6.3 million households could afford no more than $125 a month in rent and decent apartments running at that level were only available for less than half of those families. The problem is clear, the number of low-income households has risen far faster than the number of low rent units available.

Her analysis also shows that for every dollar spent on defense in 1981, 14 cents was spent on low-income housing and in Reagan's fiscal year 1985 proposal 1.5 cents would be spent on low-income housing.

Mr. President, Congress is in the midst of a major debate on the budgets for fiscal year 1984 and fiscal year 1985, and I urge my colleagues to study this report which contains a wealth of information on the budget effects on housing the poor of this Nation. It makes a compelling case for a need to reorder our spending priorities.

Mr. President, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The report follows:

LOW-INCOME HOUSING: A GROWING CRISIS

Testimony of Cushing N. Dolbeare, President, National Low Income Housing Coalition, before Subcommittee on HUD-Independent Agencies, Committee on Appropriations, U.S. House of Representatives, April 11, 1984.

The National Low Income Housing Coalition appreciates this opportunity to testify on the 1985 appropriation for the Department of Housing and Urban Development. We will emphasize low income housing, and attempt to set the Department's budget request in the context of the critical housing needs of low income people.

Two years ago, President Reagan's Commission on Housing submitted its final report to him. That report stated that there were over ten million very low income renter households in this nation. One quarter lived in subsidized housing. Almost all of the rest were in substandard housing or paying more than 25 percent of their income for shelter, or both. In other words, after almost half a century of providing housing assistance for low income people, we are still at least 7.5 million units short.

The National Low Income Housing Coalition believes that sound, effective programs to meet the needs of these 7.5 million households should have the highest priority in allocating resources for housing. To deal with their needs, we believe several major changes in federal policy and programs—unfortunately reaching well beyond the jurisdiction of this committee—must be adopted. Primary among these are a housing allowance (or "voucher") program, under which the groundrules for eligibility would be set and then vouchers made available for all who qualified. Such a program must be coupled with effective approaches to provision of affordable housing, or the cost of the program could become uncontrollable. We therefore propose that at least 750,000 units be added to the permanent stock of affordable units each year.

The rising cost of assisted housing programs is due in large measure to an inability to control housing costs. Over the decade of the 1970's a decade which saw the largest increase in assisted housing units ever, we lost a net of over one million low rent units (rents below $125 monthly) form the inventory each year, primarily (but not exclusively) to rising rents and utility costs. Using the present 30 percent-of-income-for-shelter standard of subsidized housing programs, a household with an income of $5,000 can "afford" $125 monthly for shelter. Yet, as the following tabulation shows, the number of low rent units has decreased far more rapidly than the number of low income households:

Households under $5,000	8.4	6.3
Units under $125	14.9	2.7
Surplus/deficit	+6.5	−3.6

In other words, even if problems of quality, availability, and suitability, location and accessibility didn't exist, in 1980 there were more than two households with incomes below $5,000 for every affordable unit in the inventory.

Since 1980, there is every reason to believe that the situation have become far worse, although reliable statistics on how much worse are not yet available.

Since 1980, the amount we have committed for additional subsidized housing for low income people has dropped by 78 percent, while housing expenditures through the tax code (primarily homeowner deductions) have continued to rise unchecked and, by some estimates, have more than doubled.

LOW INCOME HOUSING BUDGET AUTHORITY AND OUTLAYS COMPARED TO HOUSING-RELATED TAX EXPENDITURES

[In billions of dollars, 1980–85]

	BA	Outlays	Tax expenditures
			CBO	OMB
1980	26.7	4.5	.....	26.5
1981	30.2	5.7	.....	33.3
1982	17.7	6.7	.....	36.6
1983	8.7	7.8	46.1	35.4
1984	9.9	8.6	50.5	38.5
1985	6.2	9.3	55.2	41.7

At least three quarters of these tax expenditures go to people in the top 15% of the income distribution. Cutting their tax subsidies in half would release enough to pay for entitlement housing allowances and substantial preservation, rehabilitation and construction. The 1985 figure would be more than $20 billion.

This pattern of inequity embedded within federal housing expenditures must be addressed. This is not a partisan issue: the imbalance between tax and direct expenditures for housing is not one that was decided upon as a matter of national policy. Instead, it just happened: the result of the spread of home ownership, the broadening of the tax base, and rising incomes.

Low income people have borne the brunt of the reordering of national priorities. For each dollar cut from low income outlays, $4.15 has been added to military spending; $2.26 to interest on public debt; and taxes have been cut by $5.40 (measured in constant 1984 dollars, comparing 1981 levels with the Administration's 1985 budget).

Using the information in the chapter on "Budget Program and Trends" in the Budget of the United States Government, FY 1985 as our major source, we have developed, for illustrative purposes, how the federal budget would be changed if we had not had the cuts in taxes and low income programs and the increases in military spending since 1981.

CHANGES NEEDED IN FEDERAL BUDGET TO RETURN TO LEVELS EQUIVALENT TO 1981

	1984	1985
Military spending	−59.3	−81.3
Tax revenue	+90.3	+113.8
Interest on public debt	−42.9	−50.6
Low income program outlays	+7.7	+10.6

A recent Congressional Budget Office study is reported to have found that the combined impact of tax and benefit changes since 1981 has resulted in an average loss of $390 per year for households with incomes below $10,000 and an average gain of $8,270 per year for households with incomes above $80,000. If we had done nothing else, we could have left low income program outlays untouched if we had been willing to forego only 10% of the tax cuts made.

Put in perspective, under the Administration's proposed 1985 budget, for each dollar spend on low income programs, we would spend $3.85 on military; $3.68 on Social Security and Medicare; and $2.33 to pay interest on the debt. About 15 cents of each low income dollars would go for housing assistance, 31 cents for Medicaid, 16 cents for food stamps, 13 cents for SSI, 11 cents for AFDC, and 14 cents for a range of smaller programs (low income energy assistance, refugees, etc).

The striking contrast between the cutbacks in housing and the increase in military spending since 1977 can best be grasped by comparing what, in budget authority, has been allocated for low income housing compared with military spending.

Small wonder that we are not meeting our low income housing needs!

Moreover, we have not yet seen the impact of the cuts of the last several years. The Administration has been able to have its cake and eat it too: the last three years have seen the highest level of completions of assisted housing units that we have ever had since subsidized housing programs began almost 50 years ago. But, as the chart on the next page shows, this is clearly the doing of the Ford and Carter Administrations.

It is important to consider the specifics of the 1985 HUD appropriation in the light of this background. We strongly urge that the Subcommittee report an appropriation bill which uses need, rather than last year's levels or the Administration's request, as your primary criterion and that you appropriate the funds authorized in 1983 for the rental rehabilitation and development program.

In addition, we strongly urge the appropriation of funds for expanding the Section 8 Existing and moderate rehabilitation programs and for additional public housing including Indian housing. These programs have proven their effectiveness in providing housing for low income people. Moreover, even though reluctantly, the Administration has proven willing to let them continue while pursuing its own housing approaches.

Although the National Low Income Housing Coalition is, mentioned above, in favor of an entitlement housing allowance program, we oppose the Administration's request to expand the minuscule voucher program approved last year. At the level requested by the Administration, it would take 86 years to provide vouchers to the 7.5 million very low income renter households not presently receiving housing assistance. Had the Administration chosen instead to use the saving in budget authority represented by shorting the contract term from fifteen to five years to expand the number of people served, it could have provided vouchers for some 300,000 additional households and reduced to 25 years the time it would take to meet our present needs.

There are, moreover, several major shortcomings to the Administration's voucher proposal. Chief among them is that payment adjustments can be made only twice over the five-year period, instead of annually. For very low income families, living at the margin of affordability, this is a painful way to try to save federal funds. We also see no merit, as long as housing programs continue to function under long-term contracts, of cutting the contract term for vouchers.

Because of the paucity of funds available for direct subsidies, increasing use has been made during the past several years of the funds available for resyndicating low income housing projects and using part of the syndication proceeds for project improvements or to reduce indebtedness. This is, in our view, a costly method of accomplishing a worthy objective: retaining the existing subsidized housing stock for low income occupancy. It would be far preferable, we believe, to appropriate directly the funds needed for project improvement and to encourage HUD, using troubled project or other subsidies, to enter into workout agreements where the mortgages are delinquent. We ask this Subcommittee to examine this question for two reasons: first, because we believe it is a better approach and, second, because provisions in the tax legislation pending in both House and Senate would make many of these resyndications unworkable and could result in the loss of additional thousands of subsidized units.

We support the immediate appropriation of the $60 million authorized last year for emergency shelters for homeless people. The growing problem of homelessness is the tip of the iceberg of the low income housing problem. It is bound to get worse, because the low income housing crisis is growing. We believe it is urgent to institutionalize within HUD the capacity to provide assistance for emergency shelters, though, if HUD is unwilling to undertake such a program, we have no objection to providing the funds to an agency which will do so. However, if the funds are appropriated to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, we believe it is vital that their purpose be confined to the provision of shelter and that the allocation formula be improved so that rural areas, which also have a problem of homelessness, can receive a share of the funds.

We also urge that the 1985 appropriation include funds for the congregate services, public housing day care, neighborhood development, and housing/welfare demonstration programs and that adequate assistance for housing counseling be provided. It is not, in our view, a feasible or adequate substitute for direct appropriations to point to the option which localities have of using community development block grant funds for these programs. Measured in constant 1984 dollars, the total level of CDBG funds has been cut almost one quarter since 1980.

Finally, the National Low Income Housing Coalition wishes to express its appreciation to the members of this Subcommittee for your efforts to keep low income housing programs alive during these difficult times. While we believe we have made a conclusive case for the need to reverse direction and expand federal support for decent, affordable housing, we also recognize that things would be even worse without your resolution and commitment.

THE 1985 HOUSING BUDGET AND LOW-INCOME HOUSING NEEDS

(An Explanation and Reference Guide)

The federal budget is far more than a set of numbers for Congressional authorizations and appropriations. The official budget materials provide a guide to what the government has done, is doing, and will do in the future.

This memo attempts to provide a broad overview of the budget and the changes which have been made in the federal government under the Reagan Administration, give the specifics on low income housing (including figures on housing reservations and production during the past decade), and provide specific information on HUD and Farmer's Home programs as well as on housing-related tax expenditures. We include several tables, as a concise way to provide information that is not readily available elsewhere. The official budget documents give detailed figures only for the 1983–85 period. We've used information from prior years to show trends and changes. Feel free to reproduce or copy this material, in whole or in part, since we want it to be as useful as possible. We'd appreciate acknowledgement to the Low Income Housing Information Service as the source.

and a copy to us with a note on how you're using it.

The budget proposals for fiscal 1985 which President Reagan submitted to the Congress on February 1 continue the Administration's efforts to reshape the role of government and reorder national priorities. However, they contain far less in the way of proposed slashes—in housing or in most other programs—than his proposal of last year or the year before. With few exceptions, the budget either stays with what the President tried to do in 1984 or accepts what Congress did with it. For example, the President again proposes to replace the Section 8 Existing program with vouchers, but otherwise does not propose to undo or substantially modify the two-year framework set by the Housing and Urban-Rural Recovery Act of 1983.

Although the cuts proposed in the 1985 budget seem relatively mild in contrast with 1982 and 1983, in any other time they would be regarded as disastrous. Total funds for additional low income housing are only 15% of the 1980 level; HUD's FY 1985 budget authority for additional low income housing would be 37% less than this year. However, because of several program changes, the number of additional households to be aided by HUD is to be only slightly lower in 1985 than this year. But FmHA program levels would be cut by 35%. The Legal Services Corporation would be abolished; so would the community services block grant.

The budget sets a return to 1971 real spending levels (i.e. eliminating the effects of inflation) for almost everything, except national defense, as the official goal of the Administration. Nevertheless, no cures—other than the rhetoric of a proposed constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget—are recommended this year to deal with the deficits caused by tax cuts and defense spending increases.

There is a general feeling here in Washington that, although Congress will likely reject many of the proposals for more cuts—as it has in the last two years—it will also resist efforts at addbacks or program expansion, primarily because of concern over the huge and growing federal deficit. Therefore, it is important to understand not only what is proposed in the budget for housing and other low income programs, but the overall context of the budget and in particular the causes of the federal deficits.

BUDGET TRENDS: MILITARY VS. LOW INCOME

"Low-income benefit programs," to use the official phrase, are a relatively small part of the total budget. OMB includes ten major programs in this group: Medicaid, subsidized housing, food stamps, WIC, child nutrition, AFDC, low-income energy assistance, SSI, food and commodity distribution, and earned income tax credit. Their total cost in 1985 is budgeted at $65.5 billion, or 7.1% of the $925.5 billion in proposed total outlays. The 1985 level is a 13% cut from what the outlays would have been at 1981 current services levels. The cumulative "savings" from cuts in these programs from 1981 through 1984 amounted to $20.8 billion, and spending in 1985 will be $7.8 billion less than it would have been without these earlier cuts. Now, President Reagan is proposing an additional $2.8 billion in cuts from these programs for 1985, and $15.9 billion more in cuts from 1986 through 1989.

In sharp contrast to the cuts in social programs—advocated on the rationale that the growth of the federal budget must be restrained and deficits reduced—stand increases in the military budget. Between 1980 and 1985, measured in constant dollars, the military budget (Defense and "National Interest" programs) increased by 36%, a hefty $73.7 billion. An additional 29% increase is projected for the 1985–89 period, again in constant dollars. Thus, if the Administration's proposals are adopted, the military budget will have increased by 85% by 1989.

Simultaneously with this huge military increase have come even large tax cuts. There have been three major tax laws since 1981, the effect of which has been to reduce federal revenues by an estimated $113.8 billion in 1985, and a whopping $595.4 billion during the five-year, 1983–87 period. Most of the tax cuts have been in individual income taxes, primarily aiding middle and upper income people. Indeed, the individual income tax reductions for 1985 totaled $121.4 billion; these and other reductions were partially offset by increases of $24.9 billion in social security and excise taxes.

Finally the deficit is now growing on itself, as rising interest rates have meant that the cost of borrowing to cover the deficit is growing more rapidly than the national debt itself. Interest on the public debt has shot up from $95.8 billion in 1980 to $151.4 billion in 1984, an increase of 117.6%. Low and middle income people will bear the primary cost of the huge deficit through spending cuts, higher interest costs on housing, cars, and other items, and probably later through tax increases.

The Administration has made much of the fact that there have been no absolute cuts in spending for low income programs. Rather, there have been "cuts in the rate of increase." True enough, if inflation is ignored. Spending for the low income subfunctions in the budget (Medicaid, subsidized housing, food and nutrition, SSI, AFDC, and other low income programs), measured in current dollars, rose from $50.7 billion in 1980 to an estimated $70.8 billion in 1985. But, as Table 1 shows, the picture is very different if we adjust for inflation. Since 1980, in constant 1984 dollars, almost $30 billion has been cut from low income programs, while the military budget has been increased by $121 billion and interest on the public debt has grown by $66 billion. Thus, for each dollar cut from low income programs, $4.15 has been added to the military budget and $2.26 to interest on the public debt. Another $5.70 has been added to Social Security and Medicare—paid for by payroll taxes. Since only about 18% of Medicare recipients have incomes below the poverty level, the bulk of this money does not go to low income people.

For each dollar authorized for national defense in 1980, we authorized 19 cents for subsidized housing programs; in 1984, we authorized only 3 cents for subsidized housing for each military dollar; in 1985 the administration proposes less than one-and-one-half cents for subsidized housing for each dollar for the military.

Looking at it another way, under the 1985 budget, for each dollar we spend on low income benefit programs, we will be spending $3.85 on the military, $3.68 on Social Security and Medicare; and $2.33 to pay interest on the public debt. About 15 cents of each low income dollar goes for housing assistance, 31 cents for Medicaid, 16 cents for food stamps, 13 cents for Supplemental Security Income (SSI), 11 cents for Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) and the rest for a variety of other low income programs.

THE HOUSING BUDGET

There are three major components of the "housing budget": HUD programs, the rural housing programs of the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA), and the costs of housing-related tax expenditures. (Tax expenditures are defined as the cost of "provisions of the Federal income tax laws that allow a special exclusion, exemption, or deduction from gross income or provide a special credit, preferential rate of tax, or deferral of tax liability.")

The sharp contrast between the direct expenditures of HUD and FmHA and the "indirect" or tax expenditures continues. While low income housing is again to be cut, OMB estimates that tax expenditures will increase by almost 10% between 1984 and 1985.

The following tabulation shows the trend of three major categories of housing expenditures: budget authority for additional low income housing assistance, housing payments (the annual subsidy cost of all the assisted units in the inventory) and housing-related tax expenditures. (The differences would be even more dramatic if we used the tax expenditure estimates of the Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation, which are much higher than those of OMB. For consistency, in this report we are sticking with the OMB estimates.)

THE HUD LOW-INCOME HOUSING BUDGET

The HUD housing proposals contain few surprises. Once again, the Administration proposes to replace the Section 8 existing program with vouchers, claiming that this would save about $5 billion. It again proposes recapture and reallocation of some funds previously appropriated for Section 8 or public housing construction. As Table 2 shows, almost one-third (30.3%) of HUD's funds for the 1985 program would come from these recaptures.

The total low income housing program would assist an additional 136,000 households: 97,500 through Section 8 (87,500 vouchers and 10,000 units of housing for the elderly or handicapped under the 202 program); 2,500 units of Indian housing; about 6,000 units from the new rental housing development program; and 30,000 units through the rehabilitation grant program. Of this total, about 18,500 units would be new or substantially rehabilitated; 30,000 would have some rehabilitation. It is assumed that the 87,500 households who would get vouchers could find housing in the existing stock of almost 30 million rental units. (See Table 3.)

The Administration is also requesting a supplemental appropriation for 1984, to provide 56,000 Section 8 existing certificates, instead of the 32,500 for which contract authority is not available. This get a bit complex. The budget authority for these units has already been appropriated; but there is not enough contract authority (annual payments) to cover them.

Perhaps the most significant part of the HUD budget is what it does not do. There are no proposals for additional rent increases, either directly or through such measures as counting food stamps as income.

HUD is proceeding to implement the new rental housing development grant program enacted last year. However, the entire $615 million authorized for this program and rental rehabilitation grants is to come from the 1984 budget, with no additional funds requested for 1985. (Some of the 1984 money will be spent in 1985, however.)

Vouchers

Once more, "vouchers" are proposed as the centerpiece of the Administration's housing program. The term itself implies more of a shift than is really there. It would not be at all inaccurate to refer to the present Section 8 Existing program as a voucher program.

The Administration's voucher program embodies three changes from the Section 8 Existing program: (1) the subsidy for each household is fixed, regardless of the amount of rent actually paid; (2) adjustments of the subsidy amount to reflect rising costs may be made only twice over a five-year period, instead of annually; and (3) the contract between HUD and the local agency administering the program is for five years, instead of fifteen years.

HUD will set the subsidy at the difference between 30% of tenant income and the fair market rent (FMR) for existing housing. These FMR's will be set at the 45th percentile of rents in each market area for units of standard quality, including recent movers but excluding new units and assisted housing units. Households finding units for less than the FMR will save money because their tenant contribution will be less than 30% of their income; households renting units for more than the FMR will pay the difference themselves, spending more than 30% of their income for rent and utilities.

Some critical things remain the same for vouchers as for Section 8. The program will be administered by state or local public housing agencies (PHA's) under HUD guidelines. Housing units must still meet basic housing quality standards (the same standards as for the Section 8 program). The payment is made directly to the landlord. In other words, the "voucher" has no cash value; it is simply a statement of the amount of rent which will be paid directly to the landlord by the PHA.

Because of the way budget authority for low income housing programs is calculated (the maximum annual cost times the number of years each contract runs), the voucher program appears to be less expensive. The $3.8 billion "saving" from vouchers is almost entirely because the contract will run for only five years, instead of for fifteen years. What that means is that the cost of extending these contracts will come in the 1990 budget instead of the budget for the year 2000.

The Administration could have provided vouchers for a total of 300,000 additional households, instead of 87,500, if it had proposed using the money "saved" to serve additional needy households instead of to cut the budget. This, however, would require an additional $700 million in annual contract authority.

In addition to the funds proposed for incremental vouchers, the Administration plans to convert as many Section 8 Existing and other contracts to vouchers as it can. It will do this as the five-year contracts come up for renewal. (The fifteen-year period for Section 8 is actually three five-year contract periods.) HUD anticipates converting about 160,000 units presently assisted under Section 8 Existing to vouchers in the next two years.

Public housing

There are no surprises or major new proposals relating to public housing and no repeat of last year's effort to replace modernization and operating subsidies with a "fair market rent" system. The only major new departure is a request for almost $1 billion ($907 million) to cover the increased interest costs of converting some short-term public housing notes to long-term bonds through the Federal Financing Bank.

The 1985 budget proposes an additional 2,500 units of Indian housing, but no further conventional public housing units. An estimated 15,200 units already in the pipeline are expected to drop out, releasing some $2,067 million in budget authority, to be used for other programs.

The public housing modernization program will receive $1.5 billion in budget authority, enough to support $761 million in modernization work. Any funds recaptured by local housing authorities, from projects which were scheduled but will not be built, will fall within the overall limit, not be in addition to it.

Public housing operating subsidies will be reduced for both 1984 and 1985, although Performance Funding System (PFS) will be used to calculate subsidy needs. A rescission of $331.4 million of 1984 funds is primarily because of lower increases in utility costs than anticipated and the impact of higher rent levels. These sources of savings are also reflected in the 1985 estimates.

HUD anticipates that an estimated 2,500 households live in public housing units that are slated to be "deprogrammed." Vouchers will be provided for those displaced.

The production "pipeline"

The pipeline refers to the new or rehabilitated housing for which funds have been appropriated, but which is not yet occupied. HUD's budget describes what will happen to these units in 1984 and 1985.

At the beginning of fiscal 1984, there were 252,979 public housing and Section 8 units in the pipeline, of which 151,494 were under construction. About half of the remaining units, 50,000, are expected to be started during the year. However, about 15,000 (5,000 Section 8 and 10,200 public housing units) will be "deobligated" or cancelled. Some 89,000 units (60,000 Section 8 and 29,000 public housing) will be completed and occupied during the year.

Although the pipeline at the beginning of 1985 is expected to be smaller, 170,000 units, there will be more deobligations than in 1984. Some 15,200 public housing units and 3,000 Section 8 units will fall out. In addition, there will be an anticipated 33,000 starts and 70,850 completions.

The presence of the pipeline has cushioned the impact of the budget cuts over the past few years. Once the units now in the pipeline are completed, additions to the subsidized housing stock will slow to a tiny trickle.

Housing payments

Largely because of the completion of units in the pipeline, the total number of subsidized housing units continues to increase. The "housing payment" appropriation covers the amounts due under all of HUD's housing subsidy contracts.

The following tabulation shows the number of subsidized units, by program, available for occupancy at the end of each year:

Program	1983	1984	1985
Section 8	1,749,904	1,958,000	2,139,000
Public housing	1,250,000	1,274,000	1,289,000
Section 236 (total)	533,469	532,000	531,000
Less units with section 8	−144,986	−173,000	−190,000
Rent supplements	−31,750	−19,000	−5,000
Net 236 units	356,733	340,000	336,000
Rent supplement	76,919	47,000	13,000
Rental subtotal	3,433,556	3,619,000	3,777,000
Section 235 ownership:
Original program	128,694	114,00	111,000
Revised	101,078	96,000	77,000
Subtotal	229,772	210,000	188,000
Grand total	3,663,328	3,829,000	3,965,000

Looked at in relationship to the extent of low income housing needs, these figures show that only a fraction of our housing needs are being met, or will be met in the foreseeable future. In 1982, President Reagan's Commission on Housing pointed out that only one-quarter of the estimated ten million very low income renter households were living in subsidized housing. Thus, the need for additional assistance was then on the order of at least 7.5 million households. At the rate of increase proposed in the 1985 budget, it will take 55 years to provide shelter just for those low income households who need it now.

Other housing programs

The conversion of rent supplement units to Section 8 will continue in 1985, with the conversion of 32.094 units. Because of this, $1.8 billion of rent supplement authority is proposed for rescission. At the end of 1985, if the schedule holds, only 13,000 units will remain under rent supplement program contracts. Similarly, HUD expects to continue, and substantially complete by the end of 1985, the conversion of about 18,000 Section 236 units.

Once more, HUD proposes to terminate the Section 8 moderate rehabilitation program, except for about 2,000 HUD-held low income units which will be sold. Another 3,000 units will be sold without rehabilitation, but with continued Section 8 subsidy.

The amounts proposed for HUD's other low income housing programs are summarized in Table 2. The proposals for other major HUD programs are shown in Table 5.

THE FARMERS HOME RURAL HOUSING BUDGET

The ax that missed HUD this year hit the Farmers Home Administration's housing programs. While the Administration is no longer pressing its rural housing block grant proposal, it is now asking for a 35% cut in the number of rural housing units assisted by FmHA. See Table 3 for the number of additional units proposed for assistance, and Table 6 for FmHA appropriation levels. Except for authority to renew expiring rural rental assistance contracts, none of FmHA's housing grant programs would receive additional funds.

TAX EXPENDITURES

Table 7 shows OMB's calculation of the cost to the Treasury of housing-related tax expenditures, the income which the federal government does not receive because of special provisions of the Internal Revenue code. Home-owner deductions for mortgage interest and property taxes are the largest. Indeed, the increased cost of these deductions between 1980 and 1985 is far larger than total 1985 outlays for low income housing assistance.

There is some discussion, in the Congress and elsewhere, of trying to modify some of the investor deductions which assist in housing construction (though generally not for very low income households), but no discussion, thus far, of capping or making more equitable the far more expensive home-owner deductions.

HOLOCAUST REMEMBRANCE

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the history of the world consists of both triumph and tragedy. Today, I wish to call attention to perhaps history's ultimate tragedy—the 40-year-old nightmare that befell Europe. This Sunday will be the first of the Days of Remembrance of victims of the Holocaust. And I know all in Congress join in recognizing this Day of Remembrance—for we must not only acknowledge history's triumph, we must also remember history's tragedy so that is may never again be repeated.

Mankind has watched many tragedies—the Armenian genocide, Stalin's cruel purges, Pol Pot's systematic murders—yet the Holocaust holds a terrible place among these examples of man's inhumanity to man. Indeed, it is almost impossible to measure the Holocaust's tragedy. The numbers cannot be understood. They are too large. Two million children's shoes; 800,000 suitcases; one million pairs of glasses—such tragedy defies understanding. And such tragedy also threatens to remain anchored in the past, far away; threatens to become a mere abstraction, standing out of reach, beyond the grasp of collective memory. True, we wrap the Holocaust in books and movies and documentaries. But we must remember also and always that the Holocaust's tragedy was real. We must remember that if it happened once, it may happen again. And we must remember that our duty is to hold the Holocaust up as a warning for future generations, for world leaders yet unborn. In short—we must remember.

Beginning with Hitler's ascent to power in 1933, the official and violent persecution of Jews and other minorities began. Deprived of their political rights, occupations, and property, the Jews of Germany suffered physical violence, mental anguish, banishment, and ultimately death. In Germany and parts of East Europe, Jews were literally worked to death. Members of the Einsatzgruppen operated throughout East Europe—200,000 collaborators assisted. In 2 days at Babi Yar in Russia, 35,000 Jews were shot. Later, methods of death were improved. Extermination became a science. A camp called Auschwitz was soon able to send 12,000 a day to their death. And ultimately, the unbelievable became believable—Hitler's implacable objective was the destruction of an entire race.

Mr. President, during the Days of Rememberance, we must hold up and recognize this most painful part of history. Approximately 6 million Jews died at the hands of the Nazis; 2 million non-Jews perished as well. And their lives must never leave our consciousness, their memory must always be with us.

In the end, the abuse of human rights—and I include the horrid abuse of these rights—may only be quelled with the weapons of justice and principled values. And in remembering the Holocaust, in remembering past abuses, we make better weapons of justice and values—our final and best hope of conquering the worst forces of man in today's world.●

WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1983

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I wish today to inform my colleagues of the growing number of voices seeking quick action on S. 1739, the Water Resources Development Act of 1983. In addition to the American Association of Port Authorities and Inland River Ports and Terminals, Inc., whose views I have in the past placed in the RECORD, the following have also called on the Senate to deliberate and pass this legislation as soon as possible:

The Association for the Improvement of the Mississippi River.

The Upper Mississippi River Basin Association.

The Interstate Conference on Water Problems.

The Associated General Contractors of America.

The National Association of Urban Flood Management Agencies.

The National Association of Dredging Contractors.

The National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges.

The American Water Works Association.

The Tennessee-American Water Co.

Mr. President, I would ask that a copy of their letters seeking action on S. 1739 be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. President, this chorus of voices grows every day, and I believe the reasons for this growing interest are clear. For one thing, it has been 8 years since a water resource development act has been enacted by Congress and the sad fact is that the needs of the country are not being met. I also believe that this may be the last chance to address these needs in this time honored manner. The prospects for such omnibus legislation in the next Congress are not good, and it is likely to be 3 or 4 years before we again have the opportunity now before us to address water resources development issues comprehensively.

Mr. President, I again urge the expeditious consideration of S. 1739 by the Senate.

The letters follow:

INTERSTATE CONFERENCE ON WATER PROBLEMS,
Washington, D.C., April 5, 1984.

Re S. 1739, Water Resources Development Act of 1983.

Hon. HOWARD BAKER, Jr.,
Hart Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAKER: I am writing on behalf of the Interstate Conference on Water Problems (ICWP) to urge expedient floor action on S. 1739, the Water Resources Development Act of 1983. ICWP is the national association of State, interstate and intrastate water officials concerned with the full range of water issues, both quality and quantity related. ICWP was established in 1959. Its purpose is to facilitate cooperation within the water community as to water issues, legislation, and Federal-State relationships. ICWP also serves as the policy advisory group on water issues to the National Governors' Association.

Water development has been at a standstill since the late 1970's, and ICWP believes new, comprehensive water project legislation must be enacted during this Congress. With omnibus water bills pending in both the House and Senate, now is the time for Congress to act.

ICWP strongly supports reform of our national water policy. We have consistently urged the establishment of a Federal-State water resources coordinating mechanism headed by an independent chairman and a State advisory committee. Such a coordinating mechanism should be responsible for promoting consistency of purpose among Federal agencies, influencing the development and implementation of water policies and programs at the Federal level, providing information on Federal water programs, and receiving and communicating State input and providing for direct State involvement. ICWP certainly feels that the provision in S. 1739 establishing a National Water Policy Board is a step in the right direction.

We support the passage of a water resources development bill and feel that S. 1739 is the proper vehicle. ICWP appreciates the hard work and dedication involved in developing this bill and urges that the Senate take action promptly.

If ICWP may be of assistance to you, please do not hesitate to contact us. We look forward to working with you toward resolving the water problems facing our nation.

Sincerely,

A. KENNETH DUNN,
Chairman.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF DREDGING CONTRACTORS,
Washington, D.C., April 17, 1984.

Hon. HOWARD H. BAKER, Jr.,
Senate Majority Leader,
The Capitol, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAKER: The National Association of Dredging Contractors feels it is crucial for both the enhancement of trade and national security and defense that S. 1739, the Water Resources Development Act sponsored by James Abdnor, be considered by the Senate at the earliest available time. Port deepening, inland waterway improvements, and operation and maintenance questions are extremely urgent issues now facing Congress.

The National Association of Dredging Contractors is a national association of private dredging companies representing all areas of our nation. At this time approximately 80 percent of the dredging work of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers is efficiently, and cost-effectively, handled by U.S. private dredging firms. Because of our unique knowledge of the waterways system, both inland and coastal, we are deeply concerned about its present state and its needs, both now and in the future.

We are now entering a recovery after a sustained worldwide recession in which ocean-going vessels suffered as never before. The U.S. is presently losing the ability to handle vital imports and exports, and unless steps are taken now to upgrade and expand our ports and harbors, America will not be able to capitalize to the fullest extent on the projected 32 percent increase in the amount of shipping expected by 1990. Ports are already beginning to see an increase in vessel calls, and with an upsurge in the shipping of bulk commodities and manufactured goods, it is crucial that we have the capacity in our ports and inland waterways to match the capacity of the short-side facilities.

One of the primary missions of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers is mobilization. Members of the NADC have joined efforts with the Corps in the Corps of Engineers Reserve Fleet (CERF) program to aid them in their mission in times of national emergency and for defense. We recognize that with new classes of defense and security vessels, adequate mobilization ability is vital, and we stand ready to do our part. Provisions in S. 1739 will help insure that the U.S. navigation system is better able to handle the situations which we must prepare for to defend our national security.

The members of the National Association of Dredging Contractors feel it is essential that work on our port and inland waterway infrastructure begin immediately, and that our projects are expedited. With S. 1739 as a basis for discussion, we hope that the Senate will take a giant step in the formulation of a sound navigation policy. It has been over twelve years since Congress last passed a comprehensive water resources bill. It is in the best interests of the nation that we do not wait any longer to address our needs. We must go forward, beginning with the timely consideration of S. 1739.

Sincerely yours,

J. A. DOWNS,
President.

ASSOCIATION FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER,
St. Louis, Mo., April 4, 1984.

Hon. HOWARD H. BAKER, Jr.,
Hart Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAKER: The Association for the Improvement of the Mississippi River, a group with over 350 members representing local governmental and developmental organizations, businesses, farm organizations, labor unions, waterway carriers and shippers organizations, has been fighting for efficient and reliable water transportation in the midwest since 1974.

Recently our group has been following and offering input to Senate Bill 1739 and the companion house bill. Although there may be a few changes needed in the senate bill, we believe it is essential that this bill be scheduled for floor debate as soon as possible. It is imperative that our country obtain Water Resources Conservation, Development, and Infrastructure Improvement and Rehabilitation legislation this year.

We are confident that with meaningful floor debate in the Senate legislation will emerge from which the Conference Committee can work out an acceptable compromise with the House.

It would be unconscionable to hold up this long delay and much needed piece of legislation any longer. Therefore, we urge you to bring Senate Bill 1739 to the floor as soon as possible.

Thank you for your consideration.

Very truly yours,

GUY E. JESTER,
President.

THE ASSOCIATED GENERAL CONTRACTORS OF AMERICA,
Washington, D.C., April 5, 1984.

Hon. HOWARD H. BAKER, Jr.,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAKER: The last major water resources bill was signed into law in 1976. Since that time, this country's waterways, ports and locks have continued to age, to deteriorate, and become obsolete.

S. 1739, the Water Resources Development Act, addresses the needs of our water resources. It authorizes 130 projects for port development, inland waterways and other related concerns. It provides for cost-sharing as a means of lessening the cost to the federal government.

The Associated General Contractors of America (AGC) respectfully urges that S. 1739 be brought to the Senate floor as soon as the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee completes consideration under its referral of the bill.

AGC's study, "America's Infrastructure: A Plan to Rebuild," documents the cost of rebuilding our locks, ports and waterways at $51.2 billion over a 19-year period. The nation has a 20-year history of failing to adequately invest in its infrastructure. S. 1739 will provide the necessary funds and authorizations to reverse this neglect of our water resources.

Thank you for your consideration of this matter.

Cordially,

SUSAN J. LOOMIS,
Associate Director,
Congressional Relations.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF URBAN FLOOD MANAGEMENT AGENCIES,
Washington, D.C., April 5, 1984.

Hon. HOWARD BAKER,
Majority Leader,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAKER: At the direction of the Board of Directors and on behalf of the Membership of the National Association of Urban Flood Management Agencies, I am writing to urge you to schedule floor debate on S. 1739, the Water Resources Development Act of 1983.

This legislation, which is the product of careful and deliberate consideration by the Committee on Environment and Public Works, contains a variety of needed flood control project authorizations, as well as important water resources policy provisions. Although our membership does not support all of the provisions in the bill, we believe nonetheless that action is urgently needed now. As you know, Congress has not passed a water resources authorization bill since 1976, with the result that the water resources program of the Federal government has virtually ground to a halt.

Floor action in the immediate future is necessary in order to allow sufficient time in this abbreviated session of Congress for a conference with the House on its version of this omnibus legislation.

Thank you for your consideration of NAUFMA's views.

Sincerely,

KENNETH L. EDWARDS,
NAUFMA President, Chief Engineer, Riverside County, Calif., Flood Control District.

UPPER MISSISSIPPI RIVER BASIN ASSOCIATION,
St. Paul, Minn., April 16, 1984.

Hon. JAMES ABDNOR,
Chairman, Water Resources Subcommittee, Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN ABDNOR: On behalf of the Upper Mississippi River Basin Association, I am writing to urge that the Senate consider as soon as possible S. 1739. The Water Resources Development Act of 1983, as reported by the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

Our Association was formed in December 1981, after the Upper Mississippi River Basin Commission was terminated by Executive Order. The Association has been actively pursuing the implementation of the "Comprehensive Master Plan for the Management of the Upper Mississippi River System" which was prepared by the Commission at the direction of Congress in Public Law 95-502. The plan contains recommendations for programs to enhance and protect the economic, environmental, and recreational values of the river system. The necessary Congressional authorizations for these programs are contained in Section 507 of S. 1739.

We are encouraged at the progress this 98th Congress has made in drafting water resources legislation. We also are aware that substantial debate remains on certain provisions with S. 1739. But this is legislation that the Senate must consider, debate, and pass, in order to enact the water resources legislation that is desperately needed across the nation. We urge timely consideration of S. 1739.

Sincerely,

DONALD R. VONNAHME,
Chairman.

AMERICAN WATER WORKS ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D.C., April 12, 1984.

Hon. HOWARD H. BAKER, Jr.,
Senate Majority Leader, Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAKER: The American Water Works Association, representing 3,000 municipal and investor-owned utilities that supply approximately 70 percent of this Nation's drinking water, strongly urges that you schedule a floor vote as soon as possible on S. 1739, the Water Resources Development Act, introduced by Senator James Abdnor (R-SD).

As you are aware, Title VIII of this bill makes loans available to both municipal and investor-owned systems for rehabilitation and expansion of municipal water supplies. While most systems do not require external funds, a small number of utilities require upgrading to meet evolving standards in the drinking water industry. In view of the American Water Works Association's strong support for provision of safe drinking water at a reasonable cost to the public, we support the loan program for those activities that require upgrading to continue to provide high quality water to their customers.

We note that the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers has sole responsibility for administering the loan program and that distribution of funds will be based on population and state need. Repayment periods are limited to 30 years and, as a condition of receiving the loan, the water supply system must maintain adequate rates to meet repayment obligations and to maintain, repair and rehabilitate the project for which the loan is made. These key provisions of this bill must be adequately enforced. Certainly, loan recipients who default should cease to be eligible for federal aid.

We also strongly concur with provisions of the bill that permit the state to submit a priority list of water supply projects to be financed by loans. The Secretary of the Army may take these priority lists into account in allocating funds among candidate projects. We strongly support the concept that projects not be listed individually in this vital legislation.

In the interest of "better water for people", the American Water Works Association supports S. 1739 and urges that this bill be considered by the full Senate at the earliest possible time.

Sincerely,

JAMES B. GROFF,
Deputy Executive Director, Government Affairs.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF STATE UNIVERSITIES AND LAND-GRANT COLLEGES,
Washington, D.C., April 19, 1984.

Hon. HOWARD H. BAKER, Jr.,
Senate Majority Leader, Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAKER: I am writing on behalf of the many scientists, engineers, and other specialists who deal with water resources in our universities. Many of these men and women have devoted their careers to teaching, research, and public service related to water development and use.

Our community is concerned about the continuing stalemate in water policy. We believe that policy is needed to deal with water conservation, water pollution, shortages, flooding, conflicts over water use and above all cost-sharing agreements on water development efforts. It has been nearly eight years, we note, since the last action on water projects. Yet on the agenda of national issues water quality appears to be of greater concern than interest rates, the federal deficit or unemployment.

We fully understand that the selection and funding of projects in water resources is controversial and that there are strong political pressures involved in these decision. As university scientists and teachers we are not directly involved in these decisions on particular issues or projects. However, we want you to know that we consider the continuing development and intelligent use of water to be vital to the nation's health and well-being. We respectfully request that this urgent piece of the nation's business be moved ahead!

We are mindful of the confidence expressed in us during the recent override on S. 684, that now permits us to continue to do research on water resources in our universities. We believe that as water development projects are developed the water research program will enable these efforts to proceed more efficiently and effectively.

We note that broad support which the veto override action received, because the bill proposed compromise solutions to complex problems. In similar vein, we suggest that the Senate bring S. 1739 to the floor, so that the issues contained therein may be considered in open debate, and a consensus achieved.

While we do not presume to suggest how these issues should be resolved, we do ask that the Senate move to consider S. 1739. It is time for action on the water resources development agenda.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

ERNEST T. SMERDON,
Chairman, Committee on Water Resources.

TENNESSEE-AMERICAN WATER CO.,
Charleston, W. Va., April 12, 1984.

Hon. HOWARD H. BAKER, Jr.,
U.S. Senate, Senate Hart Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BAKER: I am writing you concerning SB-1739 sponsored by Senator Abdnor, South Dakota. As you know, it has been almost eight years since Congress has passed water resource legislation. While I realize passage of SB-1739 may not be in keeping with the administration's effort to reduce the federal deficit, I do believe that the Title VIII Loan Program, which is part of the proposed legislation, does have merit. I want to make it clear I do not favor federal grants for water resource projects but I do favor low interest cost loans to water purveyors on a cost-sharing basis as proposed in SB-1739.

Senator Baker, I would appreciate it if you would consider allowing this bill to come to the floor of the Senate for debate.

Very truly yours,

EDWARD W. LIMBACH,
President.●

TRIBUTE TO BILL EVANS

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, a good friend and prominent San Diegan, Bill Evans, passed away last Sunday, April 22. Bill was a moving force in the development of San Diego. He was a devoted supporter of Ronald Reagan's political career. He was also a philanthropist and a family man. I will, as will San Diego, miss him greatly. At this point, I ask that a fine article about Bill's life by Lynne Carrier of the San Diego Tribune be printed in the RECORD.

HOTELIER EVANS RECALLED AS CREATIVE, TENACIOUS

(By Lynne Carrier)

Those who knew William Donald Evans describe him as a doer.

He was the first to build a hotel on Mission Bay. He put up a high-rise apartment building downtown when others shunned such projects. He collected dozens of antique automobiles, then built a private museum for them.

The La Jolla hotelier died Sunday of a heart attack at 61, while still pursuing his hobbies and business activities.

Services will be at 11 a.m. tomorrow at St. James-by-the-Sea Episcopal Church in La Jolla.

"Bill Evans was a major force behind the development of Mission Bay and an inspiration to his friends with his dedication, energy, enthusiasm and consummate ability in the business world," said Gordon C. Luce, chairman of Great American Federal Savings & Loan and a longtime friend of Evans'.

Evans built the Bahia Resort Hotel, the first on Mission Bay, in 1954. Later be expanded the Bahia and built a second hotel, the Catamaran, in Mission Beach. He also operated a cruise boat on the bay, the Bahia Belle, which sank and was rebuilt and put back into service.

"He was a very strong-willed guy," recalls Lester Earnest, who was director of the city's Park and Recreation Department when Evans got a lease from the city to build the Bahia Hotel. "When he decided to do something, you'd better get out of the road."

Not all his plans came to fruition, though. He dropped one proposal to build a floating convention center on the bay, to have been called the Bahia Princess. He also gave up on a 1981 proposal to build a convention hotel on the city-owned site of the old Belmont Park in Mission Beach. Evans had operated the amusement park from 1969 to its closing in 1976. He pleased preservationists by donating the park's vintage 1925 roller coaster to the Save Our Heritage Organization two years ago.

Earnest described Evans as a creative thinker, always coming up with plans on how to make his businesses succeed. Before the Bahia Hotel began to prosper, he said, Evans contemplated leasing units there for 12 months, on the condition that the lease holders let Evans rent their rooms to tourists during the summer months. In exchange, the lease holders would get the free use of boats, which could double as their living quarters during the summer months and become the property of the lease holders after five years. Earnest said Evans abandoned that idea after his hotel business began picking up.

City Councilman Bill Cleator, another of Evans' friends, remembers him as a political conservative who was active in the Republican Party.

"He was the first one beating the drums for Ronald Reagan," Cleator said, adding that Evans supported Reagan before he was elected governor of California in 1966. Evans later became a delegate for Reagan at the Republican national conventions in 1976 and 1980.

Evans also was a quite philanthropist who supported charitable causes without fanfare, Cleator said.

Another acquaintance, W. Daniel Larsen, a member of the Centre City Development Corp., remembered Evans as "a great guy" who "wasn't afraid to put his money on the line to get something done."

Evans is survived by his wife, Anne, a son, William L. of Los Angeles; four daughters, Grace Chereashore of San Francisco, Nancy of San Diego, and Anne and Margaret, who are attending colleges on the East Coast.

The family requests donations to the Aero-Space Museum in Balboa Park or to Meals on Wheels.●

UNITED STATES TIES WITH CHINA AND TAIWAN

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, President Reagan's visit to mainland China this week emphasizes the importance of the Chinese people in international relations. While the focus on attention during this period will be on mainland China and its leaders, I would like to offer a few thoughts on the significance of U.S. ties with both the Republic of China on Taiwan and mainland China.

Mainland China has become a major market for U.S. agricultural products. In fiscal year 1982, mainland China was our seventh largest market for farm products, with purchases of over $1.5 billion. As a result of the textile trade dispute, mainland China fell to 17th position with purchases of over one-half billion dollars in 1983. The decline resulted from China halting purchases of U.S. wheat under our long-term grain sales agreement. That agreement calls for the purchase of 6 million metric tons of wheat annually, but in 1983 China purchased only 1.9 million metric tons. The Government of China has given assurances that they will purchase the additional 4.1 million metric tons in 1984, but there is a legitimate concern about their ability to transport that amount of grain in 1 year.

Taiwan is also a very important market for our farm products. Just last year, a trade delegation from Taiwan visited my home State of South Dakota and purchased substantial quantities of wheat. In fact, Taiwan was the eighth largest purchaser of U.S. farm products in fiscal year 1983 with imports worth $1.3 billion.

It is clear that both nations are important agricultural trading partners. In particular, we need to place a high priority on resolving agricultural trade conflicts with mainland China. For this reason, I have contacted the President, urging him to give agricultural trade issues the highest priority during his personal meetings with Chinese leaders.

President Reagan has made clear his strong support for a continued close relationship with our friends and allies on Taiwan. It is essential that a multibillion dollar trade partner and valuable security ally not be sacrificed to the whims of changing Chinese Communist Party leaders. In Taiwan, we have a steadfast and loyal ally. Our goal should be to try to draw mainland China toward the U.S. system of greater individual liberty and private enterprise, and Taiwan stands as a rare model in Asia for its efforts to move in that direction.

Some have called for close United States military ties with Communist China. I oppose this, and so do the great majority of other Members of Congress. Although the United States and mainland China share a common interest in opposing Soviet aggression and interference in the affairs of Pacific region nations, it would be a mistake to give Communist Chinese officials United States weapons technology or to cut off the flow of trade and technology between ourselves and our friends on Taiwan. If commitment to principle is an important criterion by which to judge the value of our security allies, then I suggest Taiwan possesses this quality and mainland China does not.

Also, Mr. President, Taiwan is well integrated into the international market trading system. In many respects it is a developed nation. Mainland China is economically and politically underdeveloped. The uncertainty of public policy in such a society is a fair warning to those who are tantalized by the prospects of 1 billion new customers. Many entrepreneurs in the United States and other nations have already suffered losses because substantial economic commitments and agreements were made but fell through because mainland China changed its mind after contracts were entered into. Additionally, there is much uncertainty about Communist China's intentions regarding Hong Kong. Soothing statements have emanated from Peking on this subject, but much doubt remains on the future of Hong Kong.

The most recent statistics show that Taiwan is a more valuable trading partner than mainland China. In 1983, they purchased 1.3 billion dollars' worth of U.S. farm goods. In the same year, U.S. farm exports to mainland China were valued at $544 million. The Taiwan connection continues to be very valuable to the United States and American farmers.

Thus, it is clear we must be very careful with our developing relationship with mainland China. Our policy formulation must be very cautious and it must involve a large measure of congressional consultation. We welcome genuine change in the People's Republic of China. But let us never forget the basic principles of Chinese nationalism and the extent to which our faithful allies on Taiwan have supported U.S. interests through appropriate security policies and an aggressive trade, economic modernization, and political development effort.

Mr. President, I ask that an April 20, 1984, Heritage Foundation study, entitled "The Limits of U.S.-China Strategic Cooperation," be printed at this point in the RECORD. It contains very useful commentary on the question of future United States-Chinese relations.

The study follows:

THE LIMITS TO UNITED STATES-CHINA STRATEGIC COOPERATION

(By Martin L. Lasater)

(Martin L. Lasater is a former Staff Associate on the Committee on Appropriations, U.S. House of Representatives. He currently heads his own consulting firm for foreign policy and security affairs analysis and frequently publishes on issues relating to U.S. policy in Asia.)

INTRODUCTION

U.S.-China ties continue to be based mainly on mutual security advantages. The U.S. Defense Department's FY 1984 Posture Statement declared that one of the national security objectives of the United States is "to build toward a durable strategic relationship with the People's Republic of China." And the Pentagon's FY 1984-85 Defense Guidance portrays China as a U.S. ally in a possible conflict with the Soviet Union, should Moscow invade the Persian Gulf. In much the same way, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger attempted to involve the Chinese in expanded strategic cooperation during his trip to China in September 1983.

The strategic importance of the People's Republic of China (PRC) was also used to explain U.S.-China relations after Secretary of State George Shultz's trip to Beijing in February 1983. Assistant Secretary of State for Asia and the Pacific Paul Wolfowitz listed reasons why China was important strategically to the U.S.:

We no longer have to plan and spend to confront a Chinese threat; our parallel interests in containing the Soviet Union have been repeatedly reaffirmed and we are in fundamental agreement that the Soviets remain the principal threat to the peace of the world; we have common interests in containing not only Vietnamese aggression in Southeast Asia and encouraging a peaceful settlement of the Kampuchean problem based on Khmer self-determination, but also in resisting Soviet aggression in Afghanistan; . . . despite problems, East Asia has emerged as one of the more stable and prosperous regions of the world, with China playing an increasingly responsible regional role.[1]

Wolfowitz also might have mentioned that one of the most frequently cited strategic benefits to the United States is that China pins down some 54 Soviet divisions along the 6,500 mile Sino-Soviet border. These divisions otherwise might be threatening U.S. interests in Western Europe or the Persian Gulf.

If Sino-American strategic cooperation is so beneficial, some have asked, can it be formalized? Can China be drawn into a quasi-defense alliance with the United States? Are there not steps Washington can take to improve China's defense capabilities as a counterbalance to the Soviet Union in Asia?

U.S. policy makers must direct their attention to such questions. The answers could provide a clear indication of the limits of strategic cooperation between the two countries. Once these have been recognized, realistic national goals and immediate objectives in U.S. China policy can be set. Otherwise, U.S. leaders will continue to vacillate between undue pessimism and optimism regarding the value of U.S.-PRC relations.

CHINA'S CURRENT FOREIGN POLICY

Fundamental to an understanding of China's foreign policy is an appreciation of Beijing's own agenda in international politics. The Chinese describe their current foreign policy as "independent." As Premier Zhao Ziyang commented on September 22, 1982:

"China's foreign policy is a policy of independence and self-determination. We shall never be attached to any big power. We will not play the Soviet card against the United States, nor the American card against the Soviet Union, nor allow any other country to play the China card."

When Secretary of Defense Weinberger visited the PRC last year and hinted at greater strategic cooperation, Chinese leaders reacted coolly. China now perceives its interests to be best served by a flexible policy, somewhat equidistant between Moscow and Washington. This aspect of China's foreign policy, signalled publicly in 1982 by Hu Yaobang, General Secretary of the Communist Party of China,[2] is markedly different from the policy of 1978-1979 when Deng Xiaoping called for increased stategic cooperation between China, the U.S., Japan, and Western Europe. The current policy line is also different from that pursued in the 1950s, when China allied itself with the Soviet Union, and contrasts as well with that pursued during much of the 1960s, when Beijing declared a plague on both superpowers.

Valuable insight into the tactical nature of Chinese foreign policy formulation was provided by the Japanese Foreign Ministry in November 1982, when it published a secret Chinese internal document outlining the reasons behind Beijing's decision to begin reapproachment with Moscow. As summarized in the Japanese newspapers Yomiuri Shimbun, the document stated:

"1. The two superpowers—the United States and the Soviet Union—are contending with each other in pursuit of hegemony. Militarily, the Soviet Union stands in an offensive position and the United States is relatively inferior. The potential strength of the United States, however, should not be underestimated.

"2. The United States normalized its diplomatic relations with China. But it did so for the purpose of compensating for its military inferiority to the Soviet Union and because it thought that normalization would be of benefit to itself. In deciding on nor-

[2] According to documents, Hu Yaobang told the delegates: "We note that Soviet leaders have expressed more than once the desire to improve relations with China. . . . If the Soviet authorities really have a sincere desire to improve relations with China and take practical steps to lift their threat to the security of our country, it will be possible for Sino-Soviet relations to move toward normalization."

malization, the United States recognized "one China," but it still continues its commitment to Taiwan. This constitutes an intervention in China's internal affairs and, for the development of U.S.-China relations, it is undesirable for the United States to continue such a policy.

"3. The Soviet Union has lately been making overtures to China for a rapprochement. This is also intended for the Soviet Union's own benefit. Although militarily it is relatively superior to the United States, the Soviet Union is isolated internationally and faces economic difficulties domestically and, therefore, it thinks that easing tension with China will be of benefit.

"4. In the final analysis, both the United States and the Soviet Union are trying to use China as a card in the process of seeking hegemony. The fact that the Soviet Union desires a rapprochement with China does not alter the intrinsic nature of Soviet hegemonism or big-power chauvinism. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union was a friend to China for a long time. An excessive confrontation with the Soviet Union is ill-advised for China as well.

"5. China is an "independent, self-reliant" state, free from the control of any other country, and is resolutely opposed to hegemonism. China's three basic lines are economic construction, national reunification through the liberation of Taiwan, and opposition to hegemonism. Of the three, economic construction is the basic line, because there can be no diplomacy without the backing of strength and, to achieve "independent, self-reliant" diplomacy, it is important to build up strength through economic construction."[3]

Although China's new, independent foreign policy does not constitute a threat to U.S. interest in East Asia or obstruct political, economic, cultural, and other relations between Washington and Beijing, it does have important implications for Sino-American strategic cooperation. While U.S.-Soviet relations have been extremely cool since 1979; Sino-Soviet relations have improved steadily since 1982. The two communist governments have stated their desire to normalize relations and move away from the high level of tension that characterized their relations from the early 1960s. Hu Yaobang in May 1983 said:

"China sincerely wishes normalization of relations with the USSR. This meets the fundamental interests of the two countries and also the interests of peace and stability in the whole world."[4]

Similarly, the late Yuri Andropov continued Leonid Brezhnev's policy of seeking improved relations with China. And from all appearances, Konstantin Chernenko intends to pursue the policies of his immediate predecessor.

Although full normalization of Sino-Soviet relations is not likely in the near future, the fact that Beijing is holding periodic, high-level talks with Moscow and making incremental adjustments in its policy toward the USSR reflects the intentions of the PRC to move toward rapprochement. Moreover, it seems apparent that, in terms of reducing the dangerous level of tension on the Sino-Soviet border and thereby indirectly deterring a Soviet attack, Beijing believes much more can be accomplished through diplomacy than through alliances with the West.

[3] Yomiuri Shimbun, Nov. 30, 1982.

[4] TASS, May 15 1983. See FBIS, Soviet Union, May 16, 1983, p. B1.

This does not mean, however, that Sino-American strategic cooperation is not still useful to the People's Republic of China. But it does call into question U.S. assumptions about automatic Chinese support on key issues of conflict between Washington and Moscow. Washington was, in fact, given advanced warning of this when China refused to support Western sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union in the wake of suppression of Solidarity and the imposition of martial law in Warsaw in December 1981.

China will cooperate strategically with the United States only when such cooperation serves Beijing's interests. Thus, the nature of the Soviet threat to Beijing, as well as the practical extent to which American assistance to China can reduce that threat, need to be reexamined in the light of current People's Republic of China thinking.

SOVIET MILITARY THREAT TO THE PRC

The opposing forces

China and the Soviet Union long have deployed massive forces along their common border. The following table indicates their relative strengths at the regional level:

USSR AND PRC ARMED FORCES IN EAST ASIA [1]

Category	U.S.S.R.	Peoples Republic of China
Ground forces:
Personnel	400,000	3,150,000
Infantry divisions	54	131
Mechanized	54	12
Tanks	12,500+	5,000+
Air forces:
Bombers	400+	850
Fighters	1,300+	5,100
Ground attack	800+	500
Naval forces:
Submarines	120	106
Aircraft carriers	2	0
Cruisers	12	0
Destroyers	20	10
Frigates	50	30

[1] U.S.S.R. figures represent the one-quarter of the Soviet's total strength that it displays in the Far East. PRC figures represent all of China's regular forces, some 50 percent of which are deployed in the northern part of the country.

In addition, Beijing and Moscow aim hundreds of tactical and strategic warheads at each other. Included in the Soviet arsenal are approximately 50 SS-20 intermediate-range theater nuclear missiles. Chinese nuclear missiles total just over 100. Most of these are well concealed, thus providing some deterrence against a Soviet first strike.

Improving deterrence has high priority for the Chinese. In March 1983, Defense Minister Zhang Aiping reaffirmed the importance of missile and nuclear programs. The Chinese leadership realizes that they cannot match Soviet missile deployments qualitatively or quantitatively; yet they believe continued research and development in these fields will lead to an adequate deterrence under most conditions.

Included in China's deterrence calculations is the notion that the United States would not stand by idly while the Soviet Union destroyed China. The concept of a U.S. "unofficial nuclear umbrella" over China was articulated by Nixon and Kissinger in 1969, when the danger of a Soviet attack against China was high. Relates Kissinger in his memoirs:

"From the beginning Nixon and I were convinced—alone among senior policymakers—that the United States could not accept a Soviet military assault on China—we imposed contingency planning on a reluctant bureaucracy as early as the summer of 1969. . . ." [5]

Yet American intervention on a scale sufficient to make any difference in a major Sino-Soviet conflict is likely to win little support from Congress or the American people. Conversely, it is doubtful that Beijing would risk destruction to aid the United States in the event of a major U.S.-Soviet confrontation.

Related to this argument are some poignant realities. Whereas Soviet forces along the Sino-Soviet border and aboard the Pacific Fleet are an awesome offensive capability, China's ground, air, and naval units are essentially defensive. As a result of the mismatch of forces, there is continuing debate over whether the PRC's People's Liberation Army could effectively stop invading Soviet forces by fighting what would essentially be a "People's War." On the other hand, it is doubtful that Moscow would want to occupy China or even to invade the country in depth. Other options available to the Soviet Union include: the destabilization of Tibet, Sinkiang, and Inner Mongolia; a preemptive strike against the PRC's nuclear weapons and production facilities; seizing Manchuria; and nuclear, chemical, or bacteriological assaults against selected administrative and/or industrial centers. These and other Soviet options would severely set back China's development, yet avoid the pitfalls of engaging the USSR in a prolonged guerrilla war in China's interior.

Pluses and minuses of the People's Liberation Army

Given the unlikelihood of U.S. intervention in the event of a Soviet attack against the PRC, the burden of self-defense would fall squarely on the shoulders of the Chinese themselves. Here then is a paradox. The People's Liberation Army constitutes the world's largest land army; it has under its control the second largest navy, and the third largest air force. Yet there is considerable doubt as to how effective a defense this huge force would be. The PLA suffers from serious weaknesses. Among them:

Ground Forces: Lack of mobility and mobilization; poor logistics for sustained offensive operations; limited power projection capability; obsolescent equipment; and weak command and control abilities.

Air Forces: Obsolescent aircraft, avionics, and weaponry; insufficient pilot training and low proficiency; inadequate communications; and inadequate engine and aircraft production capabilities.

Naval Forces: Obsolescent ships, sensors, and weapons; extremely limited shipboard surface-to-air (SAM) capabilities; limited amphibious lift capabilities; and limited antisubmarine warfare (ASW) capabilities.

The modernization of the PLA has the lowest priority under the Four Modernizations—major economic development goals introduced by Deng Xiaoping in 1978. This ranking does not please the Chinese military leaders, but seems reasonable, given the need of a modern armed force for strong economic and heavy industry sectors. CIA analysts Sydney Jammes and G. Lawrence Lamborn believe that over the next fifteen years "China will not develop an offensive capability against the USSR," but that "China's defensive capabilities will be significantly improved by 1995 if political stability, economic growth, and scientific and

Among the PRC's assets are a dedicated leadership committed to modernization, excellent international credit ratings, availability of advanced technology from abroad, and determination to avoid future costly military engagements such as the conflict with Vietnam in 1979. Current obstacles, however, are serious: the low supply of trained researchers and engineers; the extent of China's nonmilitary needs that compete with the military for limited resources; serious technological weaknesses affecting China's ability to produce high quality weapons; severe problems in China's defense industry from basic research to maintenance of finished products; and organizational deficiencies within the PLA.

Cognizant of this situation from 1978 through mid-1980, Washington and Beijing toyed with the idea of modernizing the PLA with American assistance. The difficulties, however, were formidable. Defense Department document Consolidated Guidance No. 8, estimated that the United States would have to give China $50 billion in military aid to build the PLA into an effective deterrent against the Soviets. While Congress would probably approve a certain amount of U.S. security assistance to China, it is scarcely likely that it would approve $50 billion worth.

It is also unrealistic to expect that China could purchase enough technology and weapons abroad to modernize its armed forces. While China is interested in various advanced fighters, antitank missiles, air defense systems, and destroyer modernization programs, few purchases have been made so far. Beijing's economic development needs are too demanding and its foreign exchange reserves too meager to buy its way to a modern armed military force. PLA modernization will thus have to come from within. As Defense Minister Zhang Aiping said in March 1983:

"In order to achieve modernization of our national defense, our first task is to develop and produce sophisticated military equipment. . . ."

Our country is a big country and it is not realistic or possible for us to buy national defense modernization from abroad. . . . At the outset it is necessary to obtain some technology that can be imported and model some weaponry on that of others. However, if we are content with copying, we will only be crawling behind others and still be unable to attain our anticipated goal. The fundamental way is to rely upon ourselves. . . .[7]

THE PRC VS. THE USSR

The current effort by Chinese and Soviet leaders to ease tensions in PRC-USSR relations should not be seen as a return to normalcy. Historically, Sino-Russian relations have not been good. Geographically, both nations have reason to fear the other. The Central Asian frontier, which extends roughly 1,900 miles from Afghanistan to Mongolia, provides access to the heartlands of both the Soviet Union and China. The provinces on both sides of the border are backward in terms of logistical facilties and communications and are sparsely populated by peoples of non-Han Chinese and non-Great Russian stock. The Chinese feel especially vulnerable through Mongolia, which borders China for some 2,500 miles. Mao called Mongolia a "first in China's back." Important invasion corridors lead east, south, and west into the most strategic regions of Northern China. The fact that the Soviets dominate Mongolia and station large numbers of troops along the Sino-Mongolian border adds immeasurably to Beijing's perception of the USSR threat.

The eastern frontier, largely defined by the Amur and Ussuri Rivers, extends about 2,300 miles. Manchuria is an area of high population, rich in agriculture, industry, and minerals, as are the bordering provinces of the Soviet Union. The region is of great strategic value to both nations. China's administrative and industrial heartland is vulnerable to a Soviet attack through Manchuria, and the strategically important Soviet naval base at Vladivostok and other key facilities are within the range of a Chinese attack from Manchuria.

Their geographic proximity plus the historic tensions between China and Russia intensify other elements of their disagreement. These include fundamental ideological differences, conflicting foreign policies in many areas of the world, intense competition for influence in Asia, racial prejudices, and conflicting national objectives. Although highly subjective, the latter two differences are linked in important ways. The fact that the Chinese and Russians are racially antagonistic adds to the perception of each that the other aims to displace them in Asia. The Chinese long have feared Russian political and territoral expansion, while the Soviets are concerned over possible long-term Chinese demographic and cultural expansion into areas now under USSR control. Given the sense of vulnerability both Moscow and Beijing feel, it is doubtful that either will reduce significantly deployments along their border.

China has posed three conditions for the normalization of Sino-Soviet relations: (1) the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan, (2) a major reduction of Soviet forces along the Sino-Soviet and Sino-Mongolian borders, and (3) the withdrawal of Soviet-backed Vietnamese troops from Kampuchea.

From the Kremlin's perspective, these demands affect not only Moscow's strategic posture toward the PRC, but also its strategic relationship to the U.S. In view of current superpower tensions, it may be unrealistic to expect the Soviet Union to pull out of Afghanistan or to end its support of Vietnam. The strategic advantages of access to these countries seem to far outweigh gestures of protest from Beijing. If Moscow withdraws from either countrty, it will in all likelihood be for reasons unrelated to the conditions set by China.

Soviet leaders have indicated a willingness to discuss mutual reductions along the Sino-Soviet border as a means of improving relations between the two countries. There is, however, evidence suggesting resistance to this among the Soviet military, who warn against the long-term Chinese threat and look with concern at possible Sino-American military cooperation. Given the powerful voice Soviet military leaders have in such affairs, it would appear that any USSR troop reductions along the border would be minimal. Such a policy would be consistent with the current building program for facilities to maintain forces there permanently.

THE U.S. FACTOR

From Moscow's point of view, U.S. forward deployments in East Asia pose a serious threat to USSR security. Current force strengths of the two countries in the Pacific region are approximately:

U.S. AND U.S.S.R. ARMED FORCES IN EAST ASIA

Category	U.S. West Pac.	U.S. East Pac.	U.S. Total	U.S.S.R.
Ground forces:
Divisions	1⅔	2⅔	4	54

And the United States is of course seriously concerned about the Soviet military buildup in East Asia—not as a threat to China, but to its own interests. Undersecretary of Defense Fred Ikle told Congress in June 1982:

"During the past decade and a half, the Soviets have taken disturbing steps to improve their military capabilities and expand their influence throughout the region. These efforts continue unabated, and five years from now the threat will be even more dangerous."[8]

Among Ikle's concerns:

The approximately 54 Soviet divisions deployed along the Sino-Soviet border, plus an additional 120,000 Soviet troops facing Southwest Asia, and more than 100,000 conducting combat operations in Afghanistan. The equipment used by these forces is rapidly being modernized.

The more than 3,000 combat aircraft stationed in the four easternmost military districts of the USSR. These forces have been upgraded significantly with the newest Soviet aircraft, such as the Foxbat interceptor, Flogger fighter, Fencer fighter-bomber, and the supersonic Backfire bomber. In each of the last two years, the Soviet replacements of Far East fighter and interceptor aircraft with new generation aircraft have far exceeded the number of fighters in the entire U.S. Pacific Air Forces.

Deployment to Asia of approximately 150 SS-20 missiles.

The growth and modernization of the Soviet Pacific Fleet, now the USSR's largest fleet containing roughly one-third of all Soviet submarines, one-fourth of all principal surface combatants, and one-third of all naval aircraft.

In addition to these deployments, the Soviet Union has dramatically improved its geostrategic position through the acquisition of basing rights at Danang, Cam Ranh Bay, and other facilities in Vietnam. These provide the Soviets with a vital sea link from Vladivostok to the Indian Ocean and beyond. They also enhance the Soviet Union's ability to interdict free world shipping in sea lanes throughout Southeast Asia.

When asked whether the United States could defeat the Soviet Union in a war in the Western Pacific, Admiral Robert E. J. Long, former Commander-in-Chief of the U.S. forces in the Pacific, responded: "I no longer believe the margin we need still exists. It's frankly too close to call."

It is apparent, therefore, that a large percentage of Soviet deployments in the Far East are targeted on the United States and its forces, not on the PRC. This means that, regardless of the state of Sino-Soviet relations, the Soviet force structure in the Far East will remain at roughly its current level. Some ground forces may be moved from along the Sino-Soviet border, but these reductions would probably be symbolic only, because of Moscow's distrust of long-term Chinese intentions in the border regions and concerns over the powerful U.S. threat to the Far Eastern provinces.

FUTURE U.S.-PRC RELATIONS

The above considerations seem to prompt answers to the questions posed.

1. Can Sino-American strategic cooperation be expanded?

Militarily speaking, strategic cooperation probably cannot be significantly increased. The reasons are in large part political. Beijing has chosen to normalize relations with Moscow. Given Soviet sensitivity to possible Sino-American military-strategic cooperation, any move in that direction by Beijing would likely spur Moscow to tighten, not relax, its ring of containment around China. At this stage of its modernization, the PRC needs a stable and peaceful environment. For this reason alone, the Chinese leadership is unlikely to jeopardize its domestic programs by deliberately increasing tensions with the Soviet Union.

Politically, Sino-American strategic cooperation is valued by both Washington and Beijing. Both want the Soviet Union to be uncertain about their intentions but not so threatened as to pursue military solutions. In a political sense, the United States and the PRC can cooperate on a wide range of international issues, particularly in Southeast Asia and potentially in Korea. In other areas of the world, however, disagreement is more likely, because the PRC defines itself as a developing nation whose interests coincide with those of the Third World while it views the U.S. as an "imperialistic," "hegemonisic" superpower. Political strategic cooperation can be increased, but only incrementally and under limited circumstances.

2. Can China be drawn into a defense alliance if the United States so desires?

For a number of reasons this appears improbable. First, China is seeking more normal relations with the USSR. A defense alliance with the United States would destroy this hope and might well lead to a serious deterioration in Sino-Soviet relations. Second, few Americans would be willing to go to war to help China fight the Soviet Union. Similarly, PRC intervention on behalf of the U.S. would be unlikely unless PRC interests were directly threatened. Third, a defense alliance with China would carry the risk of severe USSR reprisal but not add to American security. There is little more the PRC can do to counterbalance the Soviet Union in Asia, and the United States already benefits from current efforts. And the situation is unlikely to change, no matter what the United States does. Fourth, a Sino-American defense alliance would signal a major departure from the U.S. strategy of maintaining a defensive perimeter in East Asia centered on Japan and other U.S. allies, notably the Republic of Korea and the Philippines. Such a shift would cause great concern among U.S. friends in Asia and precipitate substantial diplomatic difficulties.

3. Can the United States improve China's defense capabilities, thereby increasing the PRC's value as a counterweight to the Soviet Union in Asia?

Over time, the U.S. probably can do a great deal to help China modernize the PLA. But the U.S. contribution will be constrained in varying degrees by: (1) congressional opposition to major military assistance programs; (2) limited availability of China's foreign exchange reserves; (3) the sheer magnitude of the modernization effort required; (4) political oppostion in Beijing to close military relations with the United States; (5) the difficulty the PLA will have in absorbing the advanced technology central to modern Western armaments; and (6) the concerns of many U.S. allies in Asia who oppose large-scale U.S. military sales to the PRC.

Following Secretary Weinberger's trip to Beijing in September 1983 and Commerce Secretary Malcolm Baldrige's earlier visit in June, the PRC was placed in export-controls category "V," a category that includes only friendly allied nations. Hence, dual-use technology, which can be applied to civilian or military purposes, now will be sold automatically to Beijing if it so requests, unless the U.S. government puts a hold on a particular item. Weapons still must be approved on a case-by-case basis, but restrictions are far more relaxed than heretofore. It is notable that Sino-American relations have warmed considerably following the mid-1983 decision by the Reagan Administration to permit these changes in the sale of high-technology items to the PRC.

It would seem, therefore, that the U.S. contribution to China's defense capabilities may be significant at the industrial-technological level, but that the limited quantities of weapons sold would have little impact on the strategic balance of power in East Asia. Moreover, any increase in China's defense capabilities would likely be countered by further Soviet force enhancement in the region. Thus, U.S. efforts to improve the PRC's defense would probably not greatly increase Beijing's counterweight value, but might have a profound regional effect where the balance of force structure is crucial, as in the Taiwan Strait area.

In sum, the fundamental national security interests of both the United States and China are well served by normalized Sino-American relations. Yet the allure of strategic cooperation with the PRC—like the image of one billion Chinese consumers for American products—should not be allowed to distort reality. The PRC is unwilling to enter into a strategic alliance with the United States, and such an alliance would not significantly enhance U.S. security interests. Both sides, however, should remain ready to cooperate when their mutual interests are threatened.

Since Marxist-Leninist theory advocates contradictory tactical maneuvering to achieve the long-range goals of the Party, the various zig-zags that have been witnessed in China's foreign policy can be expected to continue, as PRC leaders perceive the shifts in the "correlation of forces" both internally and internationally.

Given these realities, the U.S. has no choice but to downgrade plans for strategic cooperation with the People's Republic of China. U.S. security policy in Asia should be based on strength and the support of traditional allies, not on perceptions of China as an ally vis-a-vis the Soviet Union. The possibility for PRC contributions to U.S. security interests will continue and should be taken advantage of when appropriate. Likewise, there is much the United States can do to enhance PRC security without increasing the threat to America's friends in Asia. But the limits of strategic cooperation must be realized clearly. It is to be ardently hoped that the age of myth in U.S.-PRC relations has ended.●

THE SECONDARY MORTGAGE MARKET

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, today I should like to report to my colleagues the status of the Secondary Mortgage Market Enhancement Act, S. 2040.

Briefly, this bill will enhance the market for privately issued mortgage backed securities and also remove some technical problems in the authorities of the quasi-government agencies involved in the secondary mortgage market. This measure passed the Senate on November 17, 1983, and was jointly referred in the House to the Banking Committee and the Energy and Commerce Committee. Further, Chairman ST GERMAIN of the House Banking Committee and my colleague from Texas, Mr. STEVE BARTLETT, with others, introduced companion legislation, H.R. 4557.

H.R. 4557 has been the subject of hearings in both committees. During our debate in the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, there was some degree of controversy surrounding the proposal to increase limits on the value of a single family mortgage that can be purchased by the quasi-government agencies, Fannie Mae, and Freddie Mac. Ultimately, the committee and the full Senate rejected the proposal. The Members of the House also face this controversial proposal. Proponents of increasing these purchase limits in both Houses of Congress state that high cost increase over the current $114,000 level is essential. Such high cost, or jumbo mortgages, must be made available for Fannie and Freddie purchase in the secondary market in order to provide housing liquidity for this upper end of the market, to lower interest rates to higher income home buyers, and to sustain the robust housing recovery. In my view, this argument is exaggerated.

Mr. President, these single-family mortgage purchase limits are already inflation adjusted. Just between 1984 and 1983 alone the limit has increased 5.3 percent from $108,300 to $114,000. The amount of $114,000 is, Mr. President, the mortgage loan amount, not the price of the home, as many believe. With an average downpayment of 25 percent, a $143,000 home can be financed through Fannie Mae or Freddie Mac. A family income of well over $60,000 would be required to even qualify for such a loan balance. Approximately only 5 percent of American families make greater than $60,000 per year. As the amount of the loan increases, logically so do the qualifying income requirements. Thus, proponents of an increased purchase limit are not talking about providing Government-assisted credit for individuals or families of meager means. Further, jumbo loans historically only account for some 6 to 8 percent of total mortgage originations.

Even in high cost areas these are upwardly mobile wage earners able to shop around. Further, mortgage credit is available, albeit sometimes at a slightly higher rate. It simply is not accurate to argue that such loans are not available, and as I will discuss in a moment, perhaps there is no added cost, but instead actually cheaper financing. Thus, I agree heartily with those who want liquidity in the jumbo market relief from high mortgage costs to the home buyer. However, in my view, S. 2040 and H.R. 4557 will provide this relief and I urge all interested parties to evaluate this rather carefully. Two years ago private sector alternatives did not exist. Now they do. Let us encourage this private market to grow, produce, and in so doing serve the home buyer in the higher brackets. If on the other hand, the agencies' mortgage purchase ceiling is lifted, and perhaps they are empowered to sell TIM's securities, the private issuers of mortgage securities are convinced, as I am, that Fannie and Freddie will dominate the jumbo market by way of their Government agency status.

Let us not resort to a typical congressional response—"What we give with the right hand we take away with the left."

I would propose to the investment and housing industries that we move for rapid passage of a mutually agreed upon form of S. 2040. Let us let the private market prove itself in this jumbo area. Let us let them innovate products, commit capital, and lower the cost to the home buyers in this small segment of the market.

After a defined period of time, we can measure their success and determine if the private sector has taken up the slack in the market. In my view, we need to use commonsense and good business judgment here. We could never clearly measure the effects of this important step if Congress were to approve additional advantages for the Federal agencies in the jumbo market area.

Also, I should like to comment on the notion that private market players are "fair weather friends." The private sector will continue to find profitable opportunities in down cycles. This is primarily due to the fact that risk or exposure in issuing "conduit" securities is minimal. One is governed by spreads, not absolute rate swings. As Mr. Pope of General Electric Credit said before the Senate Housing Subcommittee, "The only thing at stake in a down cycle is not whether adequate capital is available, but instead whether the home buyer can afford the loan." And that is true for those mortgages purchased by Fannie Mae as well.

Mr. President, I should like to include in the RECORD a study that has just been completed of this high cost area proposal by the General Accounting Office. At the request of Congressman STEVE BARTLETT, the GAO makes a detailed study of how interest rates and fees paid by borrowers for conventional loans which exceeded the 1983 limit of $108,300 differed from those paid by borrowers for conventional conforming—under the $108,300 limit—loans.

The results of this GAO study are fascinating and I call my colleagues attention to this report's finding that on "the basis of the data provided, * * * [the] effective mortgage interest rates for non-conforming loans were consistently lower than those for conforming loans."

Mr. President, I ask that the GAO report dated April 5, 1984, entitled "Borrowers Pay Lower Effective Interest Rates on Large Conventional Mortgage Loans," be printed in full in the RECORD.

The material follows:

U.S. GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE,

Subject: Borrowers Pay Lower Effective Interest Rates for Large Conventional Mortgage Loans (GAO/RCED-84-151).

HON. STEVE BARTLETT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BARTLETT: Your December 23, 1983, letter, requested that we study how the statutory limit (generally referred to as the conforming limit [1] on the size of home mortgages affects the behavior and pricing policies of lending institutions. Subsequently, we agreed to focus our work on three questions related to the impact of the 1983 statutory limit on home purchases. Specifically, the questions were:

1. What proportion of conventional [2] mortgage loan exceeded the conforming loan limit of $108,300 in 1983?

2. How did interest rates and fees paid by borrowers for conventional loans which exceeded the 1983 conforming limit differ from those paid by borrowers for conventional conforming loans?

3. What income would a hypothetical borrower need to qualify for the maximum conforming loan in various high-cost housing markets if the conforming limit was raised as proposed in H.R. 3420?

These questions were considered relevant to your consideration of H.R. 3420, the Secondary Mortgage Market Equity Act, which would raise the conforming mortgage limit in high-cost housing markets.

Briefly, our research shows that only about 8.3 percent of all conventional loans in 1983 exceeded the 1983 conforming limit of $108,300 and that borrowers who received these large loans were charged lower effective [3] interest rates than those whose loans fell below the conforming limit. In addition, if the conforming limit was raised in high-cost areas as proposed in H.R. 3420, household incomes of $60,000 to $80,500 would be needed to qualify for mortgages between the 1984 conforming limit of $114,000 and the new limits for high-cost housing areas. The highest conforming limit under the proposed law would be about $152,000.

BACKGROUND

The Federal National Mortgage Association (FNMA) and the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation (FHLMC) purchase mortgages from lenders who, in turn, use the funds to make additional home loans. However, these agencies are limited to purchasing mortgages whose principal amounts do not exceed the conforming loan limit. FNMA and FHLMC purchase both conventional mortgages and those guaranteed or insured by the federal government.

The conforming mortgage loan limit for FNMA and FHLMC is set by section 305(a)(2) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act, as amended (12 U.S.C. 1454(a)(2)(C)) and section 302(b)(2) of the Federal National Mortgage Association Charter Act, as amended (12 U.S.C. 1717(b)(3)), respectively. Both acts require the conforming mortgage loan limit to be adjusted annually based on a Federal Home Loan Bank Board (FHLBB) index of nationwide average home purchase prices. The conforming mortgage loan limit for single-family homes was raised from $108,300 in 1983 to $114,000 in 1984.

H.R. 3420 would raise the conforming mortgage limit in high-cost housing markets by percentages equal to the percentage adjustments made for FHA mortgage limits in these same markets. These FHA high-cost area adjustments are based on a cost index reflecting area differences in the cost of housing. By law FHA adjustments cannot exceed 133⅓ percent of the nationwide FHA mortgage limit.

OBJECTIVES, SCOPE, AND METHODOLOGY

To determine the proportion and terms of conventional loans that exceeded the conforming mortgage loan limit of $108,300 in 1983, we initially reviewed testimony concerning the volume of conforming loans presented by FNMA, FHLMC, and the General Electric Credit Corporation in May 1983 hearings before the Subcommittee on Housing and Urban Affairs, Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs. We also discussed the questions with Congressional Budget Office and Congressional Research Service (CRS) housing specialists.

On the basis of our initial efforts, we determined that no entity tracks the number or the terms of all conventional mortgage loans made each year or how these factors differ between conforming and nonconform-

[1] The conforming mortgage loan limit is the maximum value that a home loan purchased by the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation or the Federal National Mortgage Association can have. Loans which do not exceed the limit are referred to as conforming loans.

[2] Conventional loans are those which are not guaranteed or insured by a federal agency, such as the Federal Housing Administration (FHA), Veterans Administration (VA), or the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA).

[3] The effective interest is the stated or nominal interest rate plus initial loan fees (or origination charges) amortized over 10 years.

ing mortgages. However, during the first 5 days of each month, FHLBB surveys over 1,500 lenders nationwide to collect such data on conventional mortgages. At our request, FHLBB used its survey data to develop monthly differences in interest rates, initial fees and charges, maturities, and loan-to-price ratios between conventional conforming loans (loans not exceeding $108,300) and conventional nonforming loans (loans exceeding $108,300) in 1983. Enclosure I describes the FHLBB survey methodology in detail. We also obtained comments on the results of FHLBB's survey from housing finance experts at CRS, FHLBB, FHLMC, Ohio State University, and the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). Our review was made from January to March 1984 and was performed in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards.

To determine the income which a hypothetical borrower would need to qualify for the maximum conforming loan in various high-cost areas if the conforming limit was raised as proposed in H.R. 3420, we (1) obtained FHA maximum mortgage amounts set by the Secretary of HUD from the Federal Register, (2) computed what the new conforming limit would be under H.R. 3420, and (3) computed annual mortgage payments for maximum conforming loans under these limits. We also obtained data on the prices of typical upper-income homes in these high-cost areas from Nationwide Relocation Services, Incorporated. Nationwide helps people who wish to move select a new area to live in and then refers them to a Nationwide broker in that area. We compared these prices with the prices of homes that could be purchased with the maximum conforming mortgages loan in 28 high-cost areas if H.R. 3420 becomes law.

PORTION OF CONVENTIONAL LOANS WHICH EXCEEDS THE CONFORMING LOAN LIMIT

On the basis of the FHLBB survey data, no more than 10.4 percent of all conventional loans in any month of 1983 exceeded the conforming mortgage limit. The percentage of loans exceeding the limit in each month ranged from 6.5 percent in January to 10.4 percent in December (see enc. II). The unweighted average of these monthly percentages was 8.3 percent for 1983. The actual average for the year would necessarily fall within the 6.5 to 10.4 percent range.[4]

INTEREST RATES AND LOAN FEES LOWER FOR NONCONFORMING LOANS

We found no studies or published data which compare interest rates (and loan fees) for conforming and nonconforming conventional loans. We therefore asked FHLBB to develop data from its monthly survey of loans which would allow us to make such a comparison. On the basis of the data provided, we found that effective mortgage interest rates for nonconforming loans were consistently lower than those for conforming loans. The unweighted average of monthly effective interest rates from the FHLBB survey in 1983 was 12.40 percent for loans greater than $108,300 and 12.86 percent for loans less than or equal to $108,300 (see enc. V). The difference resulted from both lower nominal interest rates and lower loan fees (or origination charges) for nonconforming loans as compared with conforming loans. The following table summarizes unweighted averages of the monthly data for interest rates and fees in 1983.

[In percent]

	Effective interest rates	Nominal interest rates	Fees and charges (percent of loan amount)
Conforming loans	12.86	12.39	2.44
Nonconforming loans	12.40	12.01	2.05

More detailed information on interest rates and fees from the FHLBB survey is shown in enclosures III, IV, and V.

The FHLBB survey results presented in the table include information on both fixed interest rate and adjustable interest rate loans. For a fixed rate loan, interest is calculated at the same rate over the entire life of the loan. With an adjustable-rate loan, the lender is permitted to adjust the interest rate based on an independent interest rate index. The interest rate for adjustable-rate loans in the FHLBB survey is for the initial loan period before any adjustment is made in the rate. We compared interest rates and fees for fixed- and adjustable-rate loans and found that the same interest rate and loan fee relationships prevailed as for all conventional loans. (See enc. VIII.)

We also found that lower interest rates and loan fees for all conventional nonconforming loans could not be attributed to shorter maturities or lower loan-to-price ratios. These comparisons are shown in enclosures VI and VII.

We asked six housing finance experts[5] to help us determine why FHLBB data show that interest rates and fees for conventional nonconforming loans were lower than those for conventional conforming loans in 1983. Several of these experts believed it logical that initial fees and charges represent a lower percent of nonconforming than of conforming loans because some fees, such as application fees and credit reports, are the same for all loans. Thus, these fixed fees would be a smaller percent of the larger (nonconforming) loans than of conforming loans. Similarly, the cost of servicing conventional nonconforming loans would be no higher than for conforming loans because servicing does not vary with the size of the loan, making lower nominal interest rates possible for large loans. These factors may partially explain the lower interest rates and percentage fees for conventional nonconforming loans.

INCOMES REQUIRED TO OBTAIN MAXIMUM LOANS UNDER H.R. 3420

H.R. 3420, the Secondary Mortgage Market Equity Act, would raise the conforming limit in high-cost housing markets by the same percentages which the Secretary of HUD uses to periodically adjust FHA mortgage limits. In 1984 a borrower would need an income of over $60,000 to qualify for a 30-year fixed interest rate loan of $114,000—the current conforming limit. If H.R. 3420 becomes law, the conforming limit would be raised in a large number of high-cost housing markets, such as Washington, D.C., San Francisco, New York City, and Dallas. In areas receiving the largest permissible increase in mortgage amount, which would be 133⅓ percent of the present $114,000 limit, the new conforming limit would become approximately $152,000. An income of at least $80,000 would be required to purchase a home with this maximum mortgage.

Enclosure IX shows similar calculations for the conforming limits in 28 high-cost markets which would result from the passage of H.R. 3420. Enclosure IX also shows the home prices implied by the higher conforming limits along with prices for a standardized single-family home in these markets. The standardized home prices were developed by Nationwide Relocation Service, Incorporated. Nationwide's standard home has 2,000 square feet of living space, three bedrooms, two baths, a family room, a two-car garage (and a basement in applicable markets), and is located in a neighborhood judged to be above average for the market area. These home prices give some perspective on the significance of the present and proposed conforming limits in these 28 high-cost markets.

Home prices implied by the proposed high-cost area conforming mortgage limits were calculated using a 75-percent loan-to-price ratio and would range from $153,520 in Oklahoma City to $202,160 in cities receiving the largest increase in the conforming limit, such as Washington, D.C., Minneapolis, and San Diego. In these same cities the prices of standardized three bedroom homes which are shown in the last column of enclosure IX (and range from $94,000 to $150,000) are such that they could be purchased without increasing the conforming limit above its present $114,000 level. Of the 28 housing markets analyzed in enclosure IX, only San Francisco; Los Angeles; New York; and Stamford, Connecticut, have standardized three bedroom home prices which could not generally be purchased under the present conforming limit.

As arranged with your office, we did not obtain written agency comments on this report. Unless you publicly announce its contents earlier, we will not make any further distribution of this report until 5 days after its issue date. At that time, we will make copies available to other interested parties.

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BOARD SURVEY METHODOLOGY

The following paragraphs have been extracted from FHLBB's Data Users Guide for its mortgage interest rate survey of interest rates and other characteristics of conventional first mortgage loans originated on single-family homes. The guide was prepared by the Statistical Division of the Office of Policy and Economic Research in January 1980. Pertinent excerpts from the guide, including underlining, follow.

A. COVERAGE

All series indicate averages of selected characteristics of fully amortized conventional first mortgage loans closed during the first five full working days of the month by major mortgage lenders for the purchase of single-family nonfarm residential properties.

Single-family nonfarm residential properties include detached and semi-detached primary residences, condominium units, vacation homes, and second homes. Mobile homes are excluded. Newly-built homes are properties where the dwelling units have never been occupied. Previously-occupied homes are properties where the dwelling units have had a prior occupant.

Fully amortized conventional first mortgage purchase loans possess the following properties: (1) they require the complete repayment of the loan principal by the scheduled maturity date (i.e., there is no final "balloon" payment), (2) they are not insured by the federal government, (3) they represent a first lien on the property, (4) they constitute a transfer of property ownership, and (5) they represent permanent, not interim, financing. Included in this definition are combination construction-purchase loans (i.e., loans in which construction financing is coupled with a permanent purchase loan in a single transaction). Loans excluded from coverage are refinancing loans, open-ended advances, junior loans (e.g., second mortgages), property or home improvement loans, interim financing loans, FHA- and VA-insured loans, construction loans, and assumed loans. All partially amortized and unamortized loans are also excluded, regardless of all other characteristics. These latter two types of mortgages, however, represent only some 2 percent of the conventional home mortgage market.

B. SURVEY METHODOLOGY

The average loan characteristics reported are derived from the individual loan data provided by a random, stratified sample of the major mortgage lenders and represent weighted averages.

The sampling strata are defined by the type, size and geographic location of the lender. The sampling fraction is reduced as lender size declines so as to minimize the sampling error for a given size class. This technique results in the selection of virtually all large lenders. The current sample consists of 951 (888) savings and loan associations, 57 (58) mortgage bankers, 405 (488) commercial banks, and 146 (105) mutual savings banks.[1]

The assigned weights are based on the relationship of the single-family conventional mortgage holdings of the sample participants of a lender type—or other measure of lender size—in each of the sample strata to the holdings of all lenders (of the same type) in a stratum. This procedure provides appropriate representation in the averages of smaller lenders which are sampled at a reduced rate. Thus, the averages represent estimates for the entire population of major mortgage lenders and virtually all (95 percent) of all conventional purchase loan activity during the first five full working days of the month.

The seven average loan characteristics reported include: (1) the contract interest rate, (2) initial fees and charges, (3) the effective interest rate, (4) the term to maturity, (5) the mortgage loan amount, (6) the purchase price, and (7) the loan-to-price ratio. Both the contract and effective interest rates are adjusted to exclude the cost of private (i.e., non-government) mortgage insurance when included in the reported contract rate. The effect of this adjustment is minor, reducing the contract rate (and effective rate) by only one or two basis points. Initial fees and charges are defined to include all fees, commissions, discounts, and "points" paid by the borrower, or seller, in order to obtain a loan, including any general charge for making the loan and specific charges made to offset lending expenses. Specific charges included are commitment application fee(s), costs of credit and appraisal reports, cost of property survey, cost of termite inspection and attorney fees for document preparation and closing services (i.e., presence at settlement). Excluded are title, homeowner, life, or private mortgage insurance, property transfer costs, prepaid real estate taxes, and prepaid interest. Also excluded are attorney fees for title search or examination as well as real estate commissions for the sale of the property. The effective interest rate includes the adjusted contract rate plus initial fees and charges amortized over a ten-year period, the latter being a rough estimate of the actual average life of a conventional mortgage. The loan-to-price ratio is the mortgage loan amount divided by the purchase price, expressed as a percentage.

C. DATA LIMITATIONS

Since the first five full working days of a month are surveyed, the averages may not be representative of the entire month, especially during months in which lending terms are in the process of change. Most mortgage lending moreover, is based on prior commitments made by lenders. The averages, therefore, should not be interpreted as measures of "market" rates and terms prevailing during the reporting period. Additionally, month-to-month changes in characteristics may not reflect "pure" changes, but rather shifts in the loan and housing composition surveyed. These shifts may reflect differences in housing characteristics, changes in relative lending volumes (among lender types or sizes and among geographic areas), and variations in loan risk. Averages for metropolitan areas are generally more prone to fluctuation as a result of these factors than are the national averages. Moreover, in those metropolitan areas in which lenders other than those covered are significant in the conventional home loan market, the average may not approach estimates for the total conventional market.

In all cases, users are encouraged to substantiate the published results with collateral information wherever possible. Use of an average of several months of data is recommended in most instances.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask that a Washington Post article from April 14, 1984, entitled "Big Borrowers Found To Pay Lower Rates," be printed in the RECORD. In addition, Mr. President, the General Accounting Office has prepared an official paper entitled "Rebuttal of Criticism of GAO Report," which addresses some points raised in the April 14, 1984, Post article. I ask that this rebuttal be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 14, 1984]

BIG BORROWERS FOUND TO PAY LOWER RATES

(By Albert B. Crenshaw)

Home buyers who take out loans so large that the Federal National Mortgage Association and the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corp. cannot buy them pay a lower effective interest rate than buyers of less expensive homes whose mortgages are eligible for Fannie Mae or Freddie Mac purchase, according to a new study by the General Accounting Office.

GAO's conclusions run counter to Fannie Mae's and Freddie Mac's position, widely accepted in the real estate industry, that they benefit home buyers by enabling them to obtain mortgages more cheaply.

The findings were immediately challenged by Fannie Mae as "inaccurate" and "misleading."

Dale Riordan, senior vice president at Fannie Mae, said that as soon as they heard about the study, officials of the association began reviewing published rate quotations and checking with lenders. Uniformly, he said, eligible (or conforming) loans were being quoted at rates one-quarter to one-half a percentage point below non-conforming ones.

"Let's face it, the report is wrong," he said.

Mark J. Riedy, chief economist of the Mortgage Bankers Association of America, also questioned the GAO's conclusions. He said he had asked several of his group's larger lender-members what their experience had been and the consensus among them and also of the MBA staff was that the GAO's "results are impossible."

Freddie Mac officials said they were still studying the report and would have no immediate comment.

The report comes against a background of a rapidly changing secondary mortgage market—a market in which the two organizations are the major participants—and a growing congressional debate over what the proper role of the government and government-related entities such as Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac ought to be.

The two organizations currently dominate the secondary market, where lenders sell mortgages to raise cash to make more loans. But in recent years private competitors to Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have emerged, raising questions, particularly among Republicans, about whether the two organizations should retain their government ties and, if so, whether they should be allowed to participate in all aspects of this rapidly changing market.

The two—particularly Fannie Mae, which is burdened by a large portfolio of below-market loans bought in earlier years—have pressed for wider powers, and the loan limit has become a particular issue.

Current law prohibits either organization from buying mortgages of more than $114,000. Some members of Congress believe that because of the organizations' congressional charters they should be compelled to direct their efforts toward benefiting less-affluent home buyers. Others regard it as unfair that people who live in high-cost areas such as Washington should be less able to obtain conforming loans.

Private competitors complain that the two organizations' ties to the government give them an advantage in the credit markets, where lenders perceive their debt as less risky. Facing that advantage, the private firms have carved a niche for themselves where Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac can't go—above the loan limit.

If that limit is raised, they fear, they will be pushed out of the business.

The GAO report is certain to add fuel to this dispute.

Requested by Rep. Steve Bartlett (R-Tex.), the study examined effective interest rates paid by borrowers of conforming and non-conforming loans, sought to determine what percentage of the market is non-conforming, and looked at how applying a high-cost-area formula similar to the one used by the Federal Housing Administration would affect loan limits and the incomes that borrowers would need.

"Briefly, our research shows that only about 8.3 percent of all conventional loans in 1983 exceeded the 1983 conforming limit of $108,300, and that borrowers who received large loans were charged lower effective interest rates than those whose loans fell below the conforming limit," the GAO said.

It defined effective interest as the stated interest rate plus initial loan fees amortized over 10 years.

The report further found that if an FHA-like standard were adopted, allowing the limit in high-cost areas to rise to as much as 133.3 percent of the nationwide limit, the maximum conforming loan would become $152,000, based on this year's limit of $114,000.

GAO noted that nobody "tracks the number and terms of all conventional mortgage loans made each year or how these factors differ between conforming and non-conforming mortgages." So it used data from a monthly survey of 1,500 lenders taken by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

Based no that, it found that borrowers of conforming loans paid an effective interest rate of 12.86 percent in 1983, compared with 12.4 for non-conforming loans.

"We compared interest rates and fees for fixed- and adjustable-rate loans and found that the same interest rate and loan fee relationships prevailed as for all conventional loans," the report said.

"We also found that lower interest rates and loan fees for all conventional non-conforming loans could not be attributed to shorter maturities or lower loan-to-price rations," it added.

The congressional auditing agency said it consulted six housing finance experts to try to explain the results. It said that several thought that since many of the fees associated with mortgage loans, such as application fees and credit reports, are fixed and not related to size of the loan, then the larger the loan the smaller a percentage they would represent.

"These factors may partially explain" the study's findings, GAO said.

Rep. Bartlett said he was "a bit surprised" by the findings, which he said "disputed the conventional assumptions" about the cost of conforming and non-conforming loans. However, he said the report was a "limited" one and that "you can't conclude" anything definite about the benefits of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac based on it.

"The study does support to some extent the conclusion that it is good public policy to encourage the continued existence of private issuers," he said.

"The most important fact Congress has to keep in mind is the enormity of the need for mortgage capital over the next 10 years," Bartlett said, adding that his conclusion is that this "need cannot be met from a sole source."

He said it is going to take Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, private issuers, and institutional investors. "Congress shouldn't, and won't, pit one group against another," he said.

Fannie Mae's Riordan said he thought the report came to a "misleading" conclusion because the data upon which it was based mixed not only fixed-rate mortgages and adjustables, but adjustables of all different types. In addition, the figures were not weighted to allow for the size of the lending institution or the amount of business it is doing.

"The report is fairly faulty," he said, adding that every lender Fannie Mae officials talked to was charging at least a quarter of a point more for non-conforming loans, and one was charging six-tenths more.

The Mortgage Bankers' Riedy said lenders he and his staff talked to reported higher rates for non-conforming loans. He said he thought the problem was with the data GAO used. "They may not have done anything incorrect with the data, but they may not have had enough . . . ," he said, adding that the agency "generally does good work."

"It's unfortunate that GAO didn't talk to any lenders because that seems to be what's missing here," he said.

REBUTTAL OF CRITICISM OF GAO REPORT—"BORROWERS PAY LOWER EFFECTIVE INTEREST RATES FOR LARGE CONVENTIONAL MORTGAGE LOANS"

Last Saturday (April 14th) the Washington Post published the attached article quoting a number of lobbyists involved in the effort to raise the limit on mortgages purchased by federal credit agencies. Our report jeopardizes their campaign by debunking their principal argument—that persons getting large loans pay more because their loans cannot be purchased in the federally created secondary mortgage market. The criticisms contained in the article were: Unweighted loan data was used in the analysis, interest rate quote by lenders would provide a better indication than closed loan data which we used, variable and fixed interest rate loans were mixed together in our analysis.

None of these criticisms are valid. When we asked two of those quoted in the paper whether they had data to support their contention that our results were incorrect, they admitted that they had no actual data, but that our results were very perplexing. Our work was based upon a FHLBB statistical survey of 1500 lenders.

UNWEIGHTED LOAN DATA WAS USED

Although the newspaper quote does not explain why the use of unweighted data would create an analytical problem, we did in fact use monthly weighted averages for all data reported. In every individual month in 1983 the result was identical to the results we reported for the entire year. The monthly data was presented in a table. We did however present a yearly average of the monthly weighted data in which we did not weight the individual months. This is not an analytical flaw nor does it affect the answer derived. Comparing large and small loans in each month provides the same result.

QUOTES BY LENDERS GIVE A DIFFERENT RESULT

Calling individual lenders, as these lobbyists did, to develop anecdotal information shows that very often, large (nonconforming) loans carry higher quoted rates than smaller (conforming) loans provided by the same lenders. Our critics believe this proves their contention that large loans carry higher interest rates.

GAO also called individual lenders and we were able to get similar results. However, in our phone calls to a small sample of individual lenders we found a considerable variance in the range of rates quoted by lenders. We also found that the quoted interest rate for larger (nonconforming) loans at one lender was below the quoted interest rate for smaller (conforming) loans at another lender, even though both lenders quoted a higher interest rate for their larger loans. Borrowers seeking large loans may shop around and get the lowest interest rate available more often then borrowers seeking smaller loans. In addition, lenders may make large loans to their better customers at lower interest rates than those quoted on the phone.

Our report is based on actual loans and loan terms (not on quotes). We rejected using quotes because they tell you nothing about actual lending rates. Furthermore, we know of no information that compares quoted interest rates with rates actually charged or the volume of loans made by each lender at quoted rates. Like new luxury car sticker prices (as compared to compacts) mortgage loan "sticker" interest rates for large loans may differ more from what borrowers actually pay as compared to the difference between quote and lending rate on small loans.

VARIABLE AND FIXED RATE LOANS WERE MIXED TOGETHER IN OUR ANALYSIS

According to the newspaper article we did not discriminate between fixed rate and variable rate loans. This is not true. We first analyzed the two types of loans separately as shown in the enclosures to the report. In both cases large loans were cheaper than small loans by a significant margin. We then combined these into a single statistic and presented this result in the text of the report, along with the statement that the results were the same whether or not all loans were combined or analyzed separately.●

SALUTE TO USD BASKETBALL

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I have long admired the fine athletes California has produced, and I ask that the comments of the San Diego Union on the University of San Diego's basketball team be printed in the RECORD.

The article referred to follows:

SCHOLARS AND ATHLETES

It seems fitting that when the University of San Diego basketball team takes the floor tonight for the school's first appearance in an NCAA Division 1 tournament its foe will be Princeton University, another school better known for academics than athletics.

The Princeton-USD game will be a welcome reminder to collegiate fans, coaches, and alumni that athletic success and academic achievement are not mutually exclusive. Players for both USD and Princeton are truly student-athletes, unlike their counterparts at many of the nation's colleges.

Not only did this year's USD basketball team win the West Coast Athletic Conference championship and qualify for the NCAA tournament, eight of its players earned honors as WCAC "scholar athletes," by achieving grade point averages of 3.0 or better in majors such as computer science, English, business, and accounting.

On the athletic side, USD qualified for a trip to the NCAA tournament in only its fifth year as a Division 1 school. In an era when recruiting violations are commonplace and all too many student-athletes never complete their college education, the academic and athletic success of the USD basketball program is a tribute to the school, its players, and its coaches.

While USD is preparing for its first NCAA championship tournament, the women's team at San Diego State University has a dual role to play in the upcoming NCAA women's tournament. The Aztec women, who compiled a 23-5 record this season, will both host and participate in first-round action in this year's event.

The Aztec women will make their first appearance in an NCAA tournament at Peterson Gym on Friday night against the University of Oregon. The success of the SDSU women's team and the university's selection as host for the first round are indicative of the SDSU athletic department's commitment to provide a first-class women's program.

We wish both the USD men and the SDSU women the best of luck in NCAA tournament play. But no matter how their games turn out, both are winners in our book.●

INFLATION WATCH

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, the staff of the Joint Economic Committee has undertaken an inflation watch project. They are monitoring recent key developments affecting prices and reviewing the outlook for inflation.

Public expectations about inflation crucially affect the economy in a number of ways. If the public expects higher inflation in the future, this will:

First, lead to demands for larger wage increases, to try to keep up with or ahead of the expected increase in prices. This can set off an inflationary price-wage spiral.

Second, lead to higher interest rates, as investors demand a greater inflation premium in order to maintain the same real rate of return.

Third, discourage saving, as consumers buy now, before prices accelerate. This stimulates the economy in the short run, but hurts it in the long run by making funds for productive investment less available.

The Survey Research Center at the University of Michigan provides monthly estimates of the public's views about inflation. They ask approximately 700 Americans two questions:

(1) during the next 12 months, do you think that prices in general will go up, or down, or stay where they are now?

(2) by about what percent do you expect prices to go up, on the average, during the next 12 months?

The most recent survey was conducted in March 1984. Responses every 6 months since March 1981 have been:

Date of survey	Percent of respondents expecting prices to— [1]					Average increase expected (pct)
	Remain same or decrease	Rise, by indicated percentage—
		1 to 5	6 to 9	10 or more	Rise, do not know amount
March 1981	26	21	11	29	11	7.0
September 1981	30	21	11	30	7	7.5
March 1982	32	29	12	23	2	6.0
September 1982	31	30	13	19	5	5.4
March 1983	44	35	5	12	3	3.3
September 1983	28	43	7	17	4	5.0
March 1984	24	45	10	16	4	5.1

[1] Responses do not add to 100 percent because 1–2 percent had no opinion, or responses not available.

Source: Survey Research Center, University of Michigan.

Inflationary expectations fell between September 1981 and March 1983, but the average predicted increase in prices has risen by more than 50 percent in the last year, from 3.3 percent in March 1983 to 5.1 percent last month. This exceeds the administration's forecast of a 4.5-percent rise in prices this year. In the past, this survey has underestimated prices in periods of accelerating inflation such as the current situation. This suggests that the public view that prices will rise by 5.1 percent over the next 12 months is likely to be conservative.

Last month one-fourth of those surveyed thought inflation will be 6 percent or more over the next year, and one-sixth believe that we will have inflation of 10 percent or more. Both figures have risen sharply over the past year.

In summary, the American public is becoming more pessimistic about inflation; in the past such changing views have foreshadowed periods of faster price increases. This increasing pessimism is rooted in our inability to reverse the deficit trend, and they pose the threat of becoming self-fulfilling prophecies as long as the present economic surge persists side by side with soaring deficits. The lesson, Mr. President, is that Congress must act now, this year, to reverse the rising deficit trend. The time for talk is over. Only action will head off a substantial surge in prices and place us back where we were in 1979 and 1980. The House of Representatives has passed a $182 billion deficit-reduction program, and the Senate must at least match that to make meaningful headway against deficits.●

OCEAN DUMPING

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, EPA announced a very important decision for New Jersey and the entire New York-New Jersey metropolitan area today. After years of regulatory delay and litigation, the EPA is taking action to help protect New Jersey's shores and fisheries, and improve the condition of our surrounding waters. This morning, EPA proposed to close the site 12 miles off New Jersey's shores, which is currently used as a dump site for sewage sludge, and move dumping further out to sea at a 106-mile site, until a permanent alternative can be found to accommodate these wastes.

This is good news for New Jersey and our entire region. Mr. President, New Jersey is viewed by many as an urban, industrial State. That is true. We are. We are the most densely populated State in the Nation. We are an industrial State. We are a State plagued by waste disposal problems.

At the same time, New Jersey has an extensive coastline which stretches some 370 miles, from the New Jersey-New York border in the north to Cape May in the south and north again to Trenton. Along this coastline are some of the most beautiful beaches on the east coast, and extensive fisheries resources. New Jersey's economy is heavily dependent on keeping our coastal waters healthy. Our tourist industry, along with a more than $1 billion per year commercial and recreational marine fishing industry, cannot tolerate continued degradation of our precious coastal resources.

Frustration in New Jersey is running at an all time high.

The Marine Protection, Research and Sanctuaries Act, known also as the Ocean Dumping Act, was enacted over a decade ago. It was intended by the Congress to put an end, once and for all, to continued degradation of our oceans. In the years that have passed since then, disposal of sewage sludge in the waters immediately surrounding New Jersey has increased by more than 50 percent.

Some projections indicate a three-fold increase in sludge dumping as mammoth, new wastewater treatment plants come on line in New York City and other coastal municipalities consider reentering the ocean. The stress this places on our coastal waters is exacerbated by the continual, unconscionable dumping of 230 million gallons of raw sewage a day into the Hudson River by the city of New York.

It is past time to put a stop to these practices. This is why EPA's announcement today, calling for a phase-out of sludge dumping close to our shores, is so welcome.

Mr. President, the resolution of waste disposal issues is not simple. I do not mean to imply it is. In deciding how to dispose of sludges, the byproduct of secondary sewage treatment facilities, we must be mindful that our environment is a fragile system. None of the potential methods for disposal are without problems. Disposal of toxic sludges on land, untreated, can contaminate ground water and soils. Incineration of toxic sludges can spread dangerous pollutants through the air. But, Mr. President, our nearby ocean waters must not continue to serve as an unregulated waste dump—just because the ocean is a cheap place to dump; just because dumpers have resisted alternatives; and just because it has been that way for years. It has got to change.

Mr. President, EPA's decision is consistent with congressional efforts and efforts actively underway in New Jersey to develop alternatives to ocean dumping of sludge. Since 1977, when the Congress adopted an amendment to the Ocean Dumping Act meant to halt ocean dumping of sewage sludge, all but a handful of sewage authorities in the New York-New Jersey region have stopped dumping their wastes in the ocean. New Jersey is moving to stop these practices. I urge others in the region to join this cleanup effort.

The State of New Jersey has an active Ocean Waste Management Committee in the Department of Environmental Protection dedicated to ending the degradation of our coastal waters. New Jersey is committed to revitalizing the waters washing our shores.

Both Governor Kean of New Jersey and myself have actively called on EPA to close the 12-mile sludge dump site and to move dumping, on an interim basis, to the 106-mile site. I will ask that our letters to Administrator Ruckelshaus on this issue be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks, along with EPA's announcement on closing the 12-mile site, and testimony I gave before the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee on amendments to the Ocean Dumping Act in March.

Mr. President, EPA's proposal will not be without cost to the six New Jersey sewage authorities which continue to dispose of wastes at the 12-mile site. However, the New Jersey Department of Environmental Protection estimates that when these costs are spread out over the large number of people served by these plants, the cost to each individual would be less than $4 per year. The same de minimus costs would obtain for the city of New York. These costs would be insignificant for the individuals involved, while the benefits to our region would be substantial.

Mr. President, the EPA will now have a comment period and public hearings before finally promulgating this decision. We are several months off from a binding rule. But significant scientific and analytic work on the part of EPA, my State, and other interested parties has laid a solid basis for finalizing this decision. I do not believe EPA will reverse its decision. The major obstacle remaining to implementation of this decision, in my judgment, lies in possible renewed litigation, to thwart congressional intent and the EPA proposal.

Therefore, Mr. President, while fully supporting EPA in its regulatory role, I intend shortly to introduce legislation, as my colleague from New Jersey BILL HUGHES has done, to phase out sludge dumping at the 12-mile site once and for all and require EPA to develop a plan to revitalize the New York Bight Apex.

I now ask that the letters I referred to be printed in the RECORD.

The letters follow:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., March 1984.

Hon. WILLIAM D. RUCKELSHAUS,
Administrator, Environmental Protection Agency, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. ADMINISTRATOR: I was enormously encouraged by your Agency's testimony on March 2, 1984 before the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, in response to my questioning about the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA) plans to require an end to ocean dumping of sewage sludge off New Jersey's shores. I write in strong support of designating the 106 mile site as an alternative to continued sludge disposal at the current site just 12 miles off New Jersey. I hope that sludge disposal at the 12 mile site can stop as quickly as possible.

As you know, the Ocean Dumping Act was enacted by the Congress over a decade ago to put an end to continued degradation of our coastal waters. In the years that have passed since then, ocean dumping of sewage sludge in the waters immediately surrounding New Jersey has increased by more than 50 percent, rather than decreasing as intended by Congress. Unless decisive steps are taken, either by EPA in regulatory proceedings, or by the Congress through legislation, the situation will only worsen.

Two mammoth new sewage treatment plants are scheduled to become operational in New York City in the late 1980's, which will aggravate current sludge disposal problems, and several municipalities are considering re-entering the ocean. The stress this pollution places on our coastal waters is exacerbated by the continual and unconscionable dumping of raw sewage into the Hudson and East River by the City of New York.

Frustration in New Jersey over these practices is at an all time high. As you know, New Jersey has an extensive coastline, which stretches some 370 miles. Along this coast are beautiful beaches, a string of thriving communities, and a significant tourist and commercial and recreational fishing industry. It is imperative to New Jersey's economy, environment and well-being that we put an end to continued degradation of our precious coastal resources. Endless regulatory delay and litigation have gone on for too long.

Based on your Agency's testimony of last week, it appears that EPA is leaning toward designation of the 106 mile site for future sludge disposal as an alternative to the existing 12 mile site. I strongly support moving the sludge disposal site further away from New Jersey's shores as we search for a permanent, long-term disposal strategy.

I look forward to working with you to resolve this issue. I would appreciate being kept informed about Agency decisions on this matter.

Best regards,

FRANK R. LAUTENBERG.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
Trenton, N.J., February 8, 1984.

Hon. WILLIAM D. RUCKELSHAUS,
Administrator, U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, Washington, D.C.

DEAR BILL: As you know, citizens and public officials in New Jersey have been concerned for some time about the ability of ocean dumping sites off the northern New Jersey shore to continue to absorb dumped sewage sludge and dredge spoils.

The shore is one of our state's most precious economic, environmental and cultural resources, and many of our citizens feel that its future could be threatened by continued dumping of such large volumes of waste in the ocean.

This is one reason why the state of New Jersey strongly supported congressional action that led to passage of amendments to the Federal Ocean Dumping Act, which required an end to ocean dumping by the end of 1981. Unfortunately, for reasons that are well known, that Act has not been implemented, and the problem of ocean dumping continues to trouble us.

Currently, more than 7 million wet tons of sewage sludge per year are dumped at a site 12 miles east Sandy Hook, New Jersey. I am concerned about the effect that continued dumping at this site of this volume of sewage sludge, much of which is contaminated with other materials, will have on the various forms of life which the ocean sustains.

Clearly, the ocean would be much better able to absorb large volumes of sewage sludge at the proposed 106 mile ocean waste disposal site without as great a threat to marine life or to the on-shore environment.

Therefore, I am writing to request that the Agency designate the 106-mile site as the preferred alternative for sewage sludge disposal.

If the 106-mile site is not designated at this time, I would urge the Agency to adopt certain limits on the continued use of the 12-mile site, such as those set forth in the package of recommendations on the reauthorization of the Marine Protection, Research, and Sanctuaries Act submitted by our Department of Environmental Protection to the Congress. Our Department's recommendations included:

A firm, five-year limit on the continued use of the site;

The imposition of a user fee surcharge on sewage sludge disposal at the site to be used to finance continued research on the environmental impacts of disposal and development of long term disposal facilities; and

The phasing out of dumping at the 12-mile site during the 5 year period suggested above.

At the same time, I believe that it is vitally important for the Agency to continue to assess the benefits and drawbacks of all land- and ocean-based sewage sludge disposal alternatives, and to continue to work with the states and with the sewage authorities in improving the quality of the sludge.

Moreover, I believe it would be wise for the agency to continue to pursue future alternatives to the so-called Mud Dump site for the disposal of dredged spoils. The capacity of this site could also reach its limits in the near future, and it would be best to explore alternatives for the disposal of dredged materials now in anticipation of that day.

New Jersey's shore supports a vibrant and important tourism industry, as well as a commercial and recreational marine fishing industry worth over $1 billion per year. It is vitally important to the future of our state that we protect the integrity of the ocean resources on which these industries depend.

I hope that you will choose the 106 mile site for sewage sludge, and that we can continue to work together to address the problems posed by all forms of ocean waste disposal.

Many thanks for your consideration.

Sincerely,

THOMAS H. KEAN,
Governor.

ENVIRONMENTAL NEWS

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency today announced that it is proposing to end disposal of sludge 12 miles offshore in the New York Bight Apex and is designating two disposal sites at the so-called 106 Mile Ocean Waste Dump Site off the Atlantic Coast to receive municipal sewage treatment sludge and aqueous industrial wastes.

At the same time it is designating a site known as the Mud Dump Site in the New York Bight for the disposal of dredged materials.

Specifically, the actions are:

A tentative denial of petitions to redesignate the 12-mile Sewage Sludge Dump Site in the New York Bight Apex and suspension of further consideration of the redesignation of the 60-Mile Alternative Sewage Sludge Dump Site.

Final designation of two separate disposal sites within the previously interim-designated 106-Mile Site located off the mid-Atlantic Ocean coast; one for municipal sludges; and the other for aqueous industrial wastes.

Final designation of the New York Bight Dredged Material Dump Site, known as the Mud Dump Site, for the disposal of dredged materials.

With regard to the tentative determination to deny petitions to redesignate the 12-Mile Site, Jack E. Ravan, EPA Assistant Administrator for Water, said, "It is generally acknowledged that the New York Bight Apex is heavily degraded. The agency has determined that the dumping of municipal sludge at the 12-Mile Site contributes to this degradation. We anticipate that this decision, along with a series of other agency programs will help to improve the overall quality of these waters which are a source of food and recreation for millions of people annually and vital to the economic well-being of the entire New York and New Jersey metropolitan area. The other programs include financing for the construction of improved sewage treatment facilities, critical evaluation of marine discharge waivers under the Clean Water Act, and additional point source pollution control measures."

Designation of a site does not authorize any actual dumping. The use of a site is granted through a permit process. This process includes the evaluation of the need for ocean dumping, the availability and impact of alternative disposal methods, the volume and characteristics of the wastes, and impacts to the marine environment. Ocean dumping permits are subject to public notice and public hearings.

In making permitting decisions, the agency's approach to ocean dumping may be summarized as follows:

(1) The agency will, as an overall principle, protect the oceans from significant adverse effects of waste disposal. The agency will particularly assure that the oceans are not used for "cheap" waste disposal as a matter of short run economic considerations alone;

(2) In any specific case, the agency will allow ocean disposal of a waste only if the applicant can demonstrate that no practicable alternatives are available that have less impact on the total environment. EPA will apply a rule of reason in determining practicability; and

(3) For the long run, the agency will actively encourage environmentally beneficial approaches such as waste minimization, recycling and reuse.

Designation of the 12-Mile Site, which is located 10.3 nautical miles east of Sandy Hook, New Jersey, expired on December 31, 1981. Since that time, the ocean dumping of municipal sludges has been continued under court order. If EPA's final decision is to deny petitions to redesignate the 12-Mile Site the petitioners will be required to relocate their dumping operations to the 106-Mile Site or other such sites as may be designated, pending the agency's action on their individual applications for ocean dumping permits.

Public hearings on the tentative denial of the petitions are scheduled for June 1984, at three locations in the New York and New Jersey area. Public notice of exact times and locations will be announced in the Federal Register.

EPA designated two disposal sites within the previously interim-designated 106-Mile Site: one for the dumping of aqueous industrial wastes; and the other for the dumping of municipal sewage treatment sludges. The 106-Mile Site is located about 135 nautical miles southeast of the entrance to New York Harbor and has been used in the past for the dumping of aqueous industrial wastes and some municipal sludges. Numerous studies have been conducted including an environmental impact statement prepared by EPA for this site.

This area was selected because of its depth, distance from shorelines, and its capacity to disperse the industrial wastes and municipal sludges. In addition, the site is located off the Continental Shelf, a preference stated explicitly in the Marine Protection, Research, and Sanctuaries Act.

Extensive monitoring plans have been developed by EPA and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, after consultation with the States of New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland. Separating the disposal of industrial wastes and municipal sludges at the sites will facilitate monitoring of the effects of dumping these materials. The industrial waste site is designated for continuing use. The designation of the municipal sludge site is limited to five years after the start of dumping at the site.

The Mud Dump Site has been designated for the disposal of dredged materials generated from the Port of New York and New Jersey. The economic viability of the Port depends on the dredging of channels to maintain sufficient operating depths for navigation. EPA is restricting the amount of dredged materials which may be dumped at the site in the future to 100 million cubic yards based upon its analysis of the capacity of the site. The agency, in conjunction with the Corps of Engineers (COE), will continue to monitor disposal at this site in order to determine its continuing ability to meet the site designation criteria. Recognizing the limitations associated with the long-term use of the Mud Dump Site, the COE with cooperation of the EPA, is actively evaluating non-ocean alternatives for the disposal of dredged material. In addition, EPA is initiating studies on alternate ocean disposal sites.

The decisions to tentatively deny the petitions to redesignate the 12-Mile Site and to designate the Mud Dump Site are based on disposal site characteristics, consideration of the nature of the materials, and their respective environmental impacts.

Dredging operations involve the relocation of naturally occurring sediments which are quite dense in relation to sea water and generally reach the bottom rapidly after disposal. The majority of this material is contained within the site's boundaries. In contrast, the highly organic and predominately liquid municipal sludge tends to disperse through the water column, is not contained within the site, and contributes to impacts beyond the 12-Mile Site boundaries. Therefore, for the dredged material, the shallower containment site is more appropriate, while for the municipal sludge a dispersive site farther removed from beaches and other resources is more appropriate.

TENTATIVE DENIAL OF PETITIONS TO REDESIGNATE 12-MILE SITE

The 12-Mile Site is located approximately 10.3 nautical miles east of Highlands, New Jersey, and 9.9 nautical miles south of Long Island. The site occupies an area of about 6.6 square nautical miles. Water depth is approximately 27 meters.

The 12-Mile Site has been used since 1924 for the ocean dumping of municipal sludges. In 1982, 7.6 million wet tons were dumped at the site.

On May 18, 1979, EPA designated the 12-Mile Site as an approved municipal sewage sludge disposal site. At the same time, an alternate site, the 60-Mile Site, was designated on an emergency basis. No sewage sludge has been dumped at the 60-Mile Site.

These designations were based on information presented in an EPA environmental impact statement (EIS) published in October 1978, in addition to the assumption that ocean dumping would end on December 31, 1981.

The designation of both the 12- and 60-Mile Sites expired on December 31, 1981.

Since that date the ocean dumping of municipal sludge has been permitted as a direct result of court orders while EPA takes action on petitions that the designation of the 12-Mile Site be extended.

Nine municipal sewerage authorities are currently using the 2-Mile Site for sludge disposal under Federal court orders.

On December 20, 1982, EPA requested comments on the possible redesignation of the 12- and 60-Mile Sites since both designations expired.

EPA's tentative decision to deny petitions to redesignate the 12-Mile Site is based upon a finding that designation of the site would not be in compliance with statutory and regulatory criteria for ocean dump site designation. Furthermore, continued use of this site for municipal sludge disposal would result in further degradation to the area, including both ecological and public health impacts.

DESIGNATION OF TWO DISPOSAL SITES LOCATED WITHIN PREVIOUSLY DESIGNATED 106-MILE OCEAN DUMP SITE

The Agency is designating two disposal sites located within the previously interim-designated 106-Mile Ocean Waste Dump Site; one for the dumping of aqueous industrial wastes, and the other for the dumping of municipal sludge treatment sludges.

The 106-Mile Site has been used since 1961 for the ocean dumping of industrial wastes. Small quantities of municipal sludges have been dumped at the 106-Mile Site since 1974.

The location of the previously interim-designated 106-Mile Site is about 120–150 nautical miles southeast of the entrance to New York Harbor.

The municipal sludge site occupies an area of approximately 100 square nautical miles and is located 120 nautical miles southeast of Ambrose Light, New York, and 115 nautical miles from Atlantic City, New Jersey, the nearest coastline. The site is located in water depths ranging from 2,250 to 2,750 meters.

The industrial waste site is located approximately 125 nautical miles southeast of Ambrose Light, New York and 105 nautical miles from Atlantic City, New Jersey, the nearest coastline. The circular site with a radius of 3.0 nautical miles, occupies an area of approximately 30 square nautical miles, is located in water depths also ranging from 2,250 to 2,750 meters.

On May 31 and June 1, 1977, EPA conducted public hearings in Toms River, New Jersey, to gather information and obtain public comment on the possible relocation of municipal sludge dumping at the 12-Mile Site to further offshore at the 106-Mile Site.

Public hearings were held at Mercer County Community College, New Jersey, on August 21, 1979, to receive comments on the draft environmental impact statement (EIS). The final EIS was published in April 1980.

On December 20, 1982, EPA proposed to designate the 106-Mile Site as an approved ocean dumping site for the authorized disposal of aqueous industrial wastes and municipal sewage treatment sludges. At that time, EPA proposed to restrict the disposal of municipal sludge to a period of 5 years during which time further studies on the environmental effects of sewage sludge dumping would be conducted.

At the same time, the Agency solicited public comment on the redesignation of the 12- and 60-Mile ocean dumping sites.

The interim designation of the 106-Mile Site expired on December 31, 1982.

On May 10, 1983, a public hearing was held in Rehoboth Beach, Delaware, to receive comments concerning the proposed action.

On December 16, 1983, EPA published in the Federal Register a Notice of Availability of all supplementary information, reports, and studies used in the decision-making process to designate the 106-Mile Site as an EPA approved ocean dump site for the dumping of aqueous industrial wastes and municipal sewage treatment sludge. A 30 day comment period followed.

TESTIMONY OF SENATOR FRANK R. LAUTENBERG

Chairman D'Amours, my colleague from New Jersey, Representative Hughes, members of the committee, I am pleased to be with you this morning.

Your committee has a long record of standing as the congressional watchdog for the oceans. I join you this morning to lend my support to your efforts. And to bring you a message from the people of New Jersey. We can no longer sit still in the face of continued degradation of the coastal waters surrounding our state.

New Jersey is viewed by many as an urban, industrial state. That is true. We are the most densely populated state in the nation. We are an industrial state. We are a state plagued by waste disposal problems.

At the same time, New Jersey has an extensive coastline which stretches some 370 miles, from the New Jersey-New York border in the North to Cape May in the South and North again to Trenton. Along this coastline, are some of the most beautiful beaches on the east coast. Along this coastline are extensive fisheries resources. New Jersey's economy is heavily dependent on keeping our coastal waters healthy. Our tourist industry, along with a more than $1 billion per year commercial and recreational marine fishing industry, cannot tolerate continued degradation of our precious coastal resources.

Frustration in New Jersey is running at an all time high.

The Ocean Dumping Act, which was enacted over a decade ago, was intended by the Congress to put an end, once and for all, to continued degradation of our oceans. In the years that have passed since then, disposal of sewage sludge in the waters immediately surrounding New Jersey, has increased by more than 50 percent. Unless steps are taken, either by EPA through its regulatory proceedings, or the Congress through legislation, the situation will only worsen.

Some projections indicate a three-fold increase in sludge dumping as mammoth new wastewater treatment plants come on line in New York City and other coastal municipalities consider re-entering the ocean. The stress this places on our coastal waters is exacerbated by the continual, unconscionable dumping of raw sewage into the Hudson River by the City of New York.

It is time to put a stop to these practices. I join today with Congressmen Hughes and Forsythe, in calling for a phase out of sludge dumping close to our shores.

In 1977, Congressman Hughes won a significant victory in this committee, and in the Congress, by amending the Ocean Dumping Act. His amendment was meant to end ocean dumping of sewage sludge. Municipalities all over this nation, with the exception of a handful of authorities in the New York-New Jersey region, have stopped dumping their wastes in the ocean. It is now seven years since that amendment was adopted. Yet, through regulatory delay and endless litigation—ocean dumping continues just miles off New Jersey's shore.

Mr. Chairman, the resolution of this issue is not simple. I do not mean to imply it is. Enormous quantities of pollutants are entering the Hudson Bay Estuary daily. Not all stem from sewage sludge disposal, but sludge disposal clearly contributes to the problem.

In deciding how to dispose of sludges, we must be mindful that our environment is a fragile system. None of the potential methods for disposal are without problems. Disposal of toxic sludges on land, untreated, can contaminate groundwater and soils. Incineration of toxic sludges can spread dangerous pollutants through the air. But, Mr. Chairman, our nearby ocean waters must not continue to serve as an unregulated waste dump, just because the ocean is a cheap place to dump; just because dumpers and regulators have resisted alternatives; just because it's been that way for years. It's got to change.

The Committee has before it several proposals. H.R. 4829 to reauthorize the Ocean Dumping Act, has been pending before this body for several years. It would make some meaningful changes in the current law by mandating that EPA formally designate ocean dumping sites, and monitor them, as a condition of their use. This would establish the simple principle that no site can be used for waste disposal unless EPA has established that it can safely assimilate wastes without undue harm to the environment. Monitoring would also insure that no unreasonable or undetected harm is occurring at a site. These elementary requirements should no longer be subject to debate. They should be part of the law.

The committee is also considering H.R. 4364, introduced by my colleagues from New Jersey, Congressmen Hughes and Forsythe. This bill is the product of years of work. It is not a sledge hammer. It is a scalpel. Its intent is to establish a regulatory framework for waste disposal decisions—a framework which recognizes public health and environment considerations as paramount, . . . but one which eliminates short-term economics as a driving force in waste disposal decisions.

The Hughes-Forsythe proposal would end sewage sludge dumping at the 12 mile site in the New York Bight Apex by 1986, unless it can be demonstrated that continued dumping at this site is less harmful to the public health and marine environment than ocean disposal at a more suitable, deepwater site. The deepwater site would most likely be the 106 mile site currently under consideration for designation by the EPA as an alternative to the 12 mile site.

H.R. 4364 would require that a phase out of dumping at the 12 mile site be made on scientific grounds, using established criteria developed over many years to protect the public health and environment. It provides for waivers from this requirement where evidence indicates they serve the public interest.

Further, Mr. Chairman, the Hughes-Forsythe proposal would permit EPA to condition any continued dumping at the 12 mile site on compliance with the Clean Water Act. This would serve as a compelling incentive for municipalities, such as New York City, which is currently dumping approximately 220 million gallons of raw sewage a day into the Hudson River, to properly treat their wastes and set up pre-treatment programs. H.R. 4364 would also permit EPA to condition dumping at the 12 mile site on a continuous, good faith effort by municipalities to search for alternatives to close-in ocean dumping.

And, Mr. Chairman, I might add I don't see satisfactory good faith evidence of such an effort right now. Finally, the bill requires EPA to develop a plan to restore the New York Bight.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation is consistent with efforts actively underway in New Jersey to develop alternatives to current ocean dumping practices. The State of New Jersey has an active Ocean Waste Management Committee in the State Department of Environmental Protection which is dedicated to ending degradation of our coastal waters. New Jersey has testified before this committee on its efforts in previous hearings, and will do so again today, along with other witnesses from my state committed to revitalizing the waters washing our shores.

Recently, Governor Kean of New Jersey called upon the EPA to designate the 106 mile site of ocean dumping and to phase out dumping at the 12 mile site. I stand with Governor Kean in this request. Tomorrow, when Administrator Ruckelshaus comes before the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, I intend to let him know how we feel in New Jersey about ocean dumping close to our shores.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that the EPA will move to designate the 106 mile site as the preferred alternative for sewage sludge disposal within the next month. Such a decision would not be without cost to the six New Jersey sewage authorities which continue to dispose of wastes at the 12 mile site. However, the New Jersey Department of Environmental Protection estimates that when these costs are spread out over the large number of people served by these plants, the cost to each individual would be less than $1 per year. The same would hold true for residents of New York City. These costs would be insignificant for the individuals involved, but the benefits to our state and region would be substantial.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I urge my friends and neighbors across the river to turn away from confrontation and litigation, and to join New Jersey in a cooperative effort to revitalize our common waters. If we would just all turn our best scientists and engineers to work on solving this problem, I am confident we can find the answers we need. Along with you, I hope that the tireless efforts of this committee will move EPA to end years of paper shuffling and to take decisive action. I commend the Committee's relentless search for a better way to protect our oceans against continued degradation of our most precious ocean resources.

I very much appreciate the opportunity to testify before you today.●

NATIONAL FISHERIES MARKETING COUNCIL

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor legislation offered by my distinguished colleague from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS). This bill, which would establish a National Fisheries Marketing Council, is a well-conceived piece of legislation deserving of our support.

We have witnessed the success of marketing councils in many agricultural areas. In this Congress, in fact, we have created a dairy promotion program precisely because we have seen the benefits that accrue to industries that are served by such a program.

We now have many underutilized marine fisheries in the United States. By passing this legislation expeditiously, the Senate can improve the economies of all of our coastal States and reduce the demand for governmental services in those States.

This is an idea whose time has come. I urge my colleagues to swiftly adopt this vital and timely legislation.●

WE MUST NOT FORGET THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, April 24 was the 69th anniversary of the start of what turned out to be only the first genocide of the twentieth century. Perhaps if we had been wise, it could have been the last. On April 24, 1915, the Ottoman Empire began to arrest and murder the leaders of the Armenian community in Ottoman lands. From May to October, 1915, the Ottoman government exterminated well over 1 million Armenians—men, women, and children—by forced marches, starvation, and outright slaughter. The Ottoman policy was very direct: "The best way to finish with the Armenian question," said one member of the Turkish Government, "is to finish off the Armenians."

Why should we remember these horrible events? Of all people, it was Adolf Hitler who answered that question. When Hitler told his cronies that he intended to exterminate the Jews, Gypsies, and all the others that did not fit his image of purity, someone dared to suggest the world might not stand still for such a vast crime. Hitler sneered "Who still talks nowadays of the extermination of the Armenians?"

Who, indeed? Our own U.S. State Department, in a footnote to an official document, has termed the historic record of these mass murders in 1915, as "ambiguous". In this year 1984, of all years, we must remind ourselves, as that quote from Adolf Hitler reminds us, that only the truth will set us free.

The record is not ambiguous. The Ottoman Empire did move the Armenians from their homes by the hundreds of thousands; did indeed make summary execution; did indeed deny them food and water. Winston Churchill pointed out that this whole, horrible, premeditated crime was "about as complete as such an act, on a scale so great, could well be." But as time has passed, the revisionists have stepped in. Other factors, we are told, must be taken into consideration. It was not so simple. Richard Cohen of the Washington Post wrote on this theme: "The last victim of any genocide is truth."

We must answer Adolf Hitler's question. We must speak of the Armenian Genocide, and commemorate the victims of the first genocide of this century. Let us hope and pray—but above all, let us conduct ourselves—so that we shall have seen the last. We must see to it that genocide is eliminated forever as something any government could ever consider as a means of extending its power.

Mr. President, one of my constituents, Mr. Nighos Mazadoorian of New Britain, Conn., wrote eloquently to me regarding this matter. He points out that some have argued that to commemorate the victims of the Armenian Genocide is to condone terrorism. That is not true. Mr. Mazadoorian writes "As an American, as a Christian, and as an Armenian, I am unequivocally opposed to terrorism . . . I know too well what it feels like to be the victim." That says it all, Mr. President. I ask that Mr. Mazadoorian's letter to me be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.,
March 10, 1984.

Hon. CHRISTOPHER J. DODD,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR DODD: I am writing this letter on behalf of my wife Elizabeth and myself to express our sincere appreciation and gratitude for your co-sponsorship of S. 241, the Levin/Wilson Resolution affirming United States recognition of the Armenian Genocide as a historical fact. In addition, I am writing this letter to make an urgent appeal to you to also co-sponsor S.J. 87, the Tsongas Resolution designating April 24 as a national day of remembrance for all victims of genocide, especially those of Armenian ancestry who died between 1915 and 1923. The passage of these two resolutions is important to us for very personal reasons.

My wife and I are both survivors of the Armenian Genocide of 1915. Out of a family of six, I was the sole survivor of the brutal massacre of most of the Armenian residents of the village of Ichmeh in the Turkish Province of Kharpert. My father had come to American and had become a naturalized American citizen before he returned to Turkey. He was still an American citizen when he was put to death in 1915. The other members of my family whose lives were taken included my mother, my six year old sister, my three year old sister and my seven month old infant sister.

My wife Elizabeth was born in the village of Yeghekee, also in the Turkish Province of Kharpert. In 1915, she accompanied her family on a deportation forced march during which her mother and two uncles were put to death, together with countless other Armenians. My wife survived only by the grace of God and under the care of the American Near East Relief in one of its many orphanages.

The present Turkish government has lobbied boldly, vigorously and thus far successfully against the passage of these two resolutions, arguing that those who seek their passage condone acts of terrorism.

As an American, as a Christian, and as an Armenian, I am unequivocally opposed to acts of terrorism against representatives of the Turkish government in the United States or anywhere else in the world. I condemn all such acts of terrorism. I know too well what it feels like to be the victim. I still have too many painfully vivid memories of the brutal terrorism carried out under orders of the Turkish government in 1915 against Armenians and in particular, against the members of my own family, to condone any form of terrorism, against any human beings, for any reason. For me to condone terrorism would be to betray my sacred spiritual heritage and to forfeit my very identity as an American, as a Christian, and as an Armenian.

My wife and I have both been Connecticut residents and citizens for over fifty-five years. We are both in our seventies and we hope to live to see the passage of these two resolutions which mean so much to us. We would be most grateful for your help in the passage of both these resolutions.

Very truly yours,

NIGHOS MAZADOORIAN.●

S. 2266—GRANTING A FEDERAL CHARTER TO THE VIETNAM VETERANS OF AMERICA, INC.

SENATOR WARNER WITHDRAWS AS A COSPONSOR

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, after careful deliberation and a review of the most recent actions of the Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc. (VVA), I must announce that I am withdrawing my cosponsorship of this organization's legislation, S. 2266, an initiative to grant VVA a Federal charter.

Only a few weeks ago, I agreed to lend my support to legislation providing a Federal charter for the VVA because I was advised that the organization had the broad purpose of reflecting the needs of all veterans who served in Vietnam and was a responsible representative of our Vietnam veterans.

Further, I was advised that the VVA was the only veterans organization of national membership which devoted itself solely to Vietnam veterans, particularly to raising public awareness of these veterans' sacrifices and service to our country.

I am now informed that the national leadership of the VVA has recently gone to Cambodia and North Vietnam and that Hanoi has now announced its recognition of the VVA as their official liaison to the United States for POW/MIA matters.

As former Secretary of the Navy during the Vietnam conflict, I cannot condone the actions of a nongovernmental organization negotiating directly with Hanoi. Such negotiations must remain the sole responsibility of the U.S. Government.

I am certain that most of the members of the VVA and many of the chapter leaders throughout the country are sincerely interested in developing a responsible, broad-based veterans organization for those who served in Vietnam. I have, in fact, commended the chairman of the Virginia chapter of the VVA for the role he played in passage of legislation by the Virginia General Assembly this year.

However, I find that I must withdraw my support of the legislation granting a Federal charter because of the actions of this organization's leadership at the national level.●

MICHIGAN SMALL BUSINESS

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, the week of May 6 to 12 has been designated National Small Business Week. This special week provides us with the opportunity to recognize the fastest growing and most job-creating sector of our economy. Small businesses have provided the foundation on which the economic strength of our Nation is based. The men and women who have taken their entrepeneurial spirit and translated these ambitions into businesses have made our Nation the worlds' leading economic power.

I would like to illustrate a few points to underscore the important role small businesses play in the economy.

There are over 14 million businesses in the United States—99.7 percent are considered small businesses.

Small businesses are growing at a tremendous rate. Between 1980 and 1982, small businesses increased between 10 and 15 percent annually.

Between 1980 and 1982, small businesses generated all of the 984,000 net new jobs in the United States.

In my own State of Michigan, small businesses employ almost 1.5 million people, over 51 percent of the State's total employment.

As more women enter the work force, many are going into business on their own. From 1980 to 1982, the number of women who owned their own business increased 2,096,000 to 2,309,000, a 10-percent gain.

The number of minorities who owned their own business increased 42.8 percent between 1972 and 1982—from 332,000 to 474,000.

Many small businesses are leading the way in the development of new products and technologies, such as computer software and health care.

Based on these facts, it is clear that small businesses will continue to provide the strength needed for our Nation to grow and compete in the world market.

It gives me great pleasure at this time, to recognize Mr. Charles O. Pyron, president of ADCO Products, Inc., of Michigan Center, who has been selected the Michigan Small Business Person of the Year by the U.S. Small Business Administration. Mr. Pyron started ADCO Products in 1971 with two employees and sales of $60,000. Today, ADCO Products employs over 100 with sales of $9,500,000. ADCO's products, which include specially formulated caulking, sealants, and adhesives, are marketed worldwide.

Mr. Pyron is also active in community affairs. He was cofounder of the Small Business Council of the Greater Jackson Chamber of Commerce and was selected chairman of the board of directors of the chamber for 1984. He also serves on the Small Business Advisory Committee of Jackson Community College and the Board of Directors of Ella Sharp Museum. I would like to commend Mr. Pyron, and congratulate him for being selected Michigan Small Business Person of the Year.

I would also like to take a moment to recognize several small business advocates in Michigan, who are being honored for their role in promoting small business and assisting small businesses to grow and prosper.

Mr. A. Samuel Greenawalt, chairman of the board—Mid Michigan, and president, major corporate division for Michigan National Banks, is the Banker Advocate of the Year. Mr. Greenawalt has taken an active role in responding to the financial needs of small business in Flint through both the rank and civic organizations. He is active with the Alliance for a Greater Flint, the Small Business Development Center/Flint Chamber of Commerce, the Flint-Genesee Corp. for Economic Growth, and the Flint/Genesee Entrepreneurship Forum, all of which are actively involved with small business.

Ms. Jean Thomas, president and owner of Distinctive Designs/Medical Interiors in Detroit, is the Women-in-Business Advocate of the Year. Ms. Thomas is the current president of the Michigan chapter of the National Association of Women Business Owners. She has a longstanding commitment to community involvement and has developed and participated in many projects to help women go into business.

Mr. Harold Marks, CPA, Prangley, Marks & Co. of Grand Rapids, is the Accountant Advocate of the Year. Marks is also the second runner-up in the national competition in this category. He is the chairman of the Small Business Council of the Grand Rapids Area Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Marks has donated his time to represent small business owners with accounting, tax, and financial planning problems.

Mr. David Snow, president of the Mister Valet Dry Cleaners of Grand Rapids, is the Minority Advocate of the Year. Mr. Snow is active with the Grand Rapids Area Chamber of Commerce and founded its Minority Business Committee in 1982. The committee's activities have included seminars, luncheons, and an extensive celebration of Minority Business Week.

Mr. Todd Anuskiewicz, research director of the Michigan Energy & Resource Association (MERRA) in Detroit, is the Innovation Award winner. Mr. Anuskiewicz has made numerous contributions to the development of small business R&D projects. One of the most successful has been the annual Michigan Conference on Federal and State R&D projects. Over 300 people attended the last conference and this success has prompted other States to request help in duplicating it. Mr. Anuskiewicz also has assisted small businesses in writing small business innovation research proposals which has resulted in grants to several Michigan firms.

These business leaders have been successful in helping small businesses in Michigan meet the challenges of our changing economy. Because of their dedication and willingness to assist others in business, they deserve our praise and admiration. I am pleased to be able to bring their accomplishments, and the role of small business in our economy, before you today.●

THE BEST DRILL SERGEANTS IN THE ARMY

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, each year the Army Training and Doctrine Command conducts a competition in both the Active Forces and Reserve components to select the two best drill sergeants in the Army. The competition among the Active Forces has been running since 1964, and the competition among the Reserve units began in 1972.

By nature these individuals are highly competitive. In the Active Forces there are some 4,000 drill sergeants across the country, and in the Reserve units, there are 4,600.

The competition for this year has just been completed, and I am proud that for one of the few times in the history of the competition the two winners are both from the same State, in this case, Oklahoma.

I want to offer my congratualtions to Sfc. Danny R. Hubbard of Fort Sill in Lawton, Okla., and Sfc. Garry L. Carter of Madill, Okla. Sergeant Hubbard is on active duty with C Battery, 4th Battalion, U.S. Army Field Training Center, at Fort Sill. Sergeant Carter is with Company C, 3d Battalion, 377th Regiment, 95th Division, headquartered in Midwest City, Okla.

These two fine young men competed for 3 days at Fort Monroe, Va. The Army-wide exercise selects the top drill sergeant from each training command in the active service, 9 in total, and the top drill sergeant from each of the 13 reserve training units. These 22 selectees then meet for the competition at Fort Monroe.

Sergeant Carter and his wife, Vicki Kay, have three children and he is an employee of KXII-TV in Ardmore, Okla. He has been a member of the Reserves for 11 years.

Sergeant Hubbard and his wife, Pam, have two children and he has been on active duty for 11 years.

Both winners have been interviewed by USA Today, and CBS Morning News, and I urge my colleagues to take the opportunity to view the interviews tomorrow on CBS. My congratulations again to these young men who are outstanding examples of the fine personnel in today's military services.●

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S.J. Res. 198. Joint resolution designating April 29, 1984, as "National Nursing Home Residents Day."

DR. THOMAS W. EVANS

(Mr. PARRIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Tom Evans delivered the prayer at the opening of our session just a moment ago. The proof is before you. Baseball's loss was religion's gain.

I am told that the Reverend Dr. Evans had a mean fast ball and a major league curve when he played for the Brooklyn Dodgers and New York Giants farm teams in the late 1930's.

But in those days baseball players did not command multimillion-dollar salaries and Dr. Evans' father wanted his son to stay on the North Carolina farm where he was raised.

Dr. Evans pitched two seasons in the minors before bowing to his father's wishes. Eventually though, he left the farm to spend 15 years in business as a traveling salesman for the National Biscuit Co.

Then, in 1958, Thomas Evans got another call from another Father who recruited him for His team. Evans turned his back on business and went into the United Methodist Church's ministry.

Dr. Evans studied at Lynchburg College, Duke University Divinity School, Scarritt, the United Methodist Church's divinity school in Nashville, and at Old Dominion University. Along the way, he picked up his masters degree and earned his doctorate in various stages of study at Wesley here in the District of Columbia and at the International Seminary in Georgia.

He has taught theology and philosophy, and for the past 6 years he has been pastor of St. John's United Methodist Church in Springfield, Va.

I might add that this is an especially significant year for the Reverend Evans and the United Methodist Church. It is the bicentennial of the founding of the denomination in the United States. On behalf of the Congress I am delighted to welcome him here today.

SOLIDARITY WITH THE KENNEDY FAMILY

(Mr. LANTOS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I know I speak for all my colleagues at this moment of anguish and agony for the Kennedy family in expressing our deeply felt sympathy and understanding of this latest tragic event.

It is clear to all of us that the death of this promising and talented young man is just a delayed reaction to a terrorist murder some years ago. The only appropriate way for the Congress and for the American people to respond is for all of us to rededicate ourselves to the fight against terrorism and to the struggle against the insidious spread of the drug culture.

THE STAR WARS PROGRAM

(Mr. DOWNEY of New York asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, it seems we never learn the lessons of history. In today's Washington Post there is a story about five administration witnesses who testified before the other body urging them to continue the President's "Star Wars" program.

Mr. Speaker, "Star Wars" will not work. The Office of Technology Assessment says so; professors from MIT and Harvard say so; anyone who has examined this issue understands that.

In 1969 and 1970, we attempted to achieve the illusive goal of nuclear superiority by introducing MIRV'd warheads into our arsenal in the belief that they would provide us more security. The Soviets inevitably followed. And we have now the dangerous and destabilizing situation where both countries are moving toward a first strike.

Mr. Speaker, we can and must stop the development of space-based weapons, they are the MIRV's of the future. The administration says treaties banning spaced-based defense are not verifiable. The testing of space-based weapons is verifiable. Weapons that are not tested are not deployed. Mr. Speaker, the time has come for this Congress to act decisively to prevent this next terrible mistake in weapons races.

A TRIBUTE TO THE CREW OF SPACE SHUTTLE "CHALLENGER"

(Mr. VOLKMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I stand before this House to pay tribute to the crew of the space shuttle Challenger, who landed April 13 at Edwards Air Force Base after completing one of the space program's most significant missions. Shuttle Comdr. Robert Crippen, pilot Francis Scobee, and mission specialists Terry Hart, George Nelson, and James Van Hoften returned having demonstrated that repairing satellites in space is feasible.

At the same time, I wish to recognize the vital contribution made to the success of this mission by the solar maximum mission control team at the Goddard Space Flight Center. The failure of the first rendezvous attempt left Solar Max in an unstable tumble that made chances of capturing the satellite improbable at best. The Goddard team, under the direction of Project Manager Frank Cepollina and Mission Operations Manager Bill Stewart, worked near magic to regain control of the runaway spacecraft, allowing commander Crippen to maneuver Challenger close enough so that Astronaut Hart could reach and berth the satellite with the remote manipulator arm.

Given another chance, the "ace satellite repair crew" came through with flying colors. Astronauts Nelson and Van Hoften restored Solar Max to health, opening to science once more the opportunity to study the Sun offered by Solar Max's unparalleled vantage point.

I extend my congratulations to the five astronauts and the ground support teams who worked to make this mission a resounding success.

IN RECOGNITION OF THE SUCCESS OF THE SOLAR MAXIMUM REPAIR MISSION

(Mr. FUQUA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Space Science and Applications, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER).

The crew commanded by Bob Crippen did a wonderful job and their repair of the solar maximum satellite is a good example of what we can do in space.

The Solar Max satellite provides us with important information about the Sun. For example, we are finding that the solar brightness—the strength of the sunshine—varies slightly, and that this may cause variations in our weather here on Earth. Understanding such variations will enable us to do a better job of predicting the weather.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make one more point about what this repair teaches us.

Originally, we thought of the shuttle as a delivery system. We thought we would merely take things to space and drop them off. But we have found that the missions are becoming richer—we are doing more and more.

What this teaches me is that we are going to need to have men up there all the time. In other words, we need a space station.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the crew and NASA for this successful mission, and I congratulate NASA for its forethought in pushing ahead on a space station.

THE REPAIR OF SOLAR MAX

(Mr. ANDREWS of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANDREWS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, thanks to the tireless efforts of Comdr. Bob Crippen, Pilot Dick Scobee, Mission Specialists George Nelson, James van Hoften, and Terry Hart, and the engineering team at Goddard Space Flight Center, we have rescued the most ambitious and successful solar flare research program ever attempted. The failure of several fuses in the satellite's attitude control system only 9 months after it was placed in orbit brought the Solar Maximum Mission to an early end, much to the disappointment of scientists throughout the world. While this $77 million satellite has been restored at one-quarter of its replacement cost, through this historic demonstration, we have closed the door forever on the era of multimillion throwaway spacecrafts.

Now that Solar Max has been repaired, we can get on with the critical observations of solar flare activity which, in time, will divulge solutions to stubborn puzzles about our own weather and climate patterns. Further, solar flares influence the intensity and composition of solar radiation and matter that bombard Earth. Magnetic storms in space that result from solar flares disrupt communications, endanger orbiting spacecraft, damage power stations and pipelines, and alter the chemistry and physics of the atmosphere. Many questions remain unanswered. Continued monitoring over many solar cycles may be necessary before convincing correlations can be drawn. That is the promise of Solar Max, and that is the debt we owe the courageous scientists and engineers that brought a hard-won success from this last, historic shuttle flight.

WHEN WILL IT EVER END?

(Mr. ANDERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the massive buildup of our dairy surplus continues. Even though Congress enacted legislation, which I supported, to distribute surplus cheese and dairy products to the needy last year, an April 24 article by columnist Jack Anderson in the Washington Post illuminates how we must find more effective ways to reduce our stockpile of dairy products. The article follows:

The federal government's massive giveaway of cheese not only was supposed to feed the hungry but also cut down on surplus cheese stocks in government warehouses. It seems the giveaway allowed some consumers to stop buying cheese at the supermarket. So the government's stockpile of surplus cheese has grown from 619 million pounds in 1981, to 1 billion pounds last year. The cost of the government's purchase of surplus cheese and butter went from $1.3 billion in 1979, to $2.8 billion in 1983.

We must do something to curtail the production of surplus dairy products in this country before we find ourselves literally buried under mountains of dried milk, cheese, and butter.

PROFESSIONAL SPORTS TEAM COMMUNITY PROTECTION ACT

(Ms. MIKULSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, weeks ago, in the middle of the night, the Baltimore Colts were stolen from our city.

They took 15 truckloads of trophies and equipment. They left behind an empty stadium and a million broken hearts.

For 31 years, Baltimore cheered our Colts on to three world championships. We stood by them in good times and we supported them in bad.

In moving the team, the Colts owner shopped from city to city as if he were looking for a site for a fast food franchise.

Sports teams should be allowed to leave cities for financial need—but not for financial greed.

Baltimore is not the only city to face this. Oakland lost its Raiders; New York lost its Jets; and now, other cities may lose their teams.

That is why I have introduced a bill to give hometown cities the right of first refusal if a sports team wants to move.

It requires an arbitration panel to decide whether a team has valid reasons for leaving a city—reasons like they are losing money or they are having to play in an outdated stadium.

Sport teams are a source of revenue for cities and they are a source of community pride. Both should be protected. This bill does just that.

LET US PAUSE AND REFLECT

(Mr. LEVIN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of knowing Robert Kennedy, but not his son David. Their lives clearly were closely intertwined in moments of high joy and those of deep tragedy.

I hope that all of us will pause today to reflect on the heavy, indeed the very heavy cost of the use of violence, both for the individual victims and for society at large. The seeds of violence can produce more than one harvest of bitter fruit. My heart goes out today with millions of others to Ethel and the entire Kennedy family.

DRIFTING TOWARD CALAMITY

(Mr. SIMON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, we tend not to pay attention to international crises until they erupt. There is one area that is drifting toward calamity that we ought to be paying attention to, and this administration ought to move aggressively on, and that is the Cyprus situation.

Right now, in Cyprus, there are some small shreds of hope. For example, the Greek and Turkish side cooperate on the water system in Nicosia, but the declaration of Turkish independence by one side is an omen for ill that ought to be paid attention to before it erupts and is in the headlines of every newspaper in this country.

I hope this administration will move aggressively to try to bring the two sides together to work something out on the island of Cyprus.

WHO STANDS IN THE WAY OF VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER, A BALANCED BUDGET, AND LINE-ITEM VETO?

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of amendments to permit voluntary school prayer, balanced budget, and line-item veto.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make these requests I must have the clearance of the majority (Democrat) and minority (Republican) leaderships. This request has been cleared by the minority leadership; I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response. That should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of these three important issues: The Democratic leadership of the House.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 2262

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed from the list of cosponsors of H.R. 2262.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

MANIFOLD BENEFITS OF THE SPACE SHUTTLE

(Mr. LUJAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take 1 minute to discuss the recent flight of the space shuttle on mission 41C. This mission, in particular, highlights the reasons for my enthusiasm for our Nation's space program. Each time the shuttle completes another mission, we have been continually thrilled with NASA's ability to successfully complete complex and challenging activities. The recent missions have made clear the enormous potential the shuttle offers us to expand our ability to do things in space. We are using the shuttle to develop new products—pharmaceuticals, alloys, semiconductors, and so forth—that will someday be valuable parts of our national economy. We are using the shuttle to develop more capability to operate in space. For example, in this last mission, the long duration exposure facility was put into orbit. This project will enable us to understand must better the effects of long-term exposure in space. There are 57 experiments that mark the beginning of a broad research program in space to test new technologies that will be required for future space missions.

The repair of the solar maximum mission further points out our expanding ability to operate in space. Now, not only can we launch satellites with a high rate of success, but NASA has shown that we can retrieve malfunctioning spacecraft and repair them, all without returning to Earth.

But all this drama detracts from another important aspect. We are using the shuttle—and our ability to perform complex activities in space—to do the basic research that will expand our knowledge and understanding of the Earth, the Sun, and the solar system. The solar maximum spacecraft that was repaired is critical to the long-term study of the Sun. The solar maximum mission will help scientists understand how the Sun works, how solar events affect the Earth's weather and communications, and the sunspot cycles.

I am delighted to see that attention is now being directed to what we can and will do in space—not simply in just getting there. This was the greatest thrill of the 41C mission this month.

OUTRAGEOUS COST OVERRUNS MUST CEASE

(Mr. ROTH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, on March 17, 1982, the President of the United States issued Executive Order 12352 which dealt with Federal procurement reform. Included in this order was subsection (c) of section 1 which stated that the Office of Federal Procurement Policy be ordered to "insure timely satisfaction of mission needs at reasonable prices by establishing criteria to improve the effectiveness of the procurement systems."

Yet today, over 2 years later, I hold in my hand a 79-cent light bulb that under the so-called reformed Federal procurement system cost the Government $435. If the average taxpayer had to pay out this outrageous amount of money for a simple light bulb, there would be quite a few households in this country left in the dark.

However, it is the Federal Government that has been left in the dark—leaving many of our officials with the inability to see that something has to be done about Federal procurement practices. Cost overruns and sole-source contract abuse must be eliminated.

These cost overruns have frequently occurred in the procurement of spare parts. The Department of Defense's shortcomings in this area have cost the taxpayers an unnecessary $9 billion. Payments of $9,100 for an Allen wrench or $23,000 for an assortment of washers and bolts are a result of sole-source procurement system that lock major contractors into the Federal Government's trough.

Reform in this spare parts procurement is needed in the areas of technical data rights, the certificate of competency program, and the ability of small business to have access to and be included on the DOD's qualified bidders list. Changes in each of these three fields would save the taxpayer a tremendous amount of money. In a year where the main topic of conversation is deficit reduction, would not spare parts procurement reform make a lot of dollarwise sense?

I urge my colleagues to review my bill, H.R. 4092, the Small Business Competitive Procurement Act which deals with each of the above areas. I believe that through positive initiative such as this, the Congress can effectively deal with Federal procurement imperfections and waste.

The Congress of the United States has acted on this matter before. In December 1982, the Congressional Commission on Government Procurement (COGP) suggested 149 recommendations which covered a wide range of procurement topics and issues. Acquisition of major systems, commercial products, research and development programs were some of those issues. It has been 2 years and still a large number of these recommendations have not been carried out.

The time for change is now. Let us rid ourselves of the horror stories that cost overruns rain on us through responsible action. Legislative initiative and reform will enable the Federal Government to purchase a light bulb for 79 cents and, once and for all, the Federal Government come in from the dark.

NEED FOR CONSTITUTIONAL DEATH PENALTY

(Mr. DEWINE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Speaker, in February, the other Chamber passed a comprehensive, constitutional death penalty. But here in this body, that bill lies dormant because the majority leadership deems such legislation too controversial. Why is it too controversial to protect society from the violent criminal? Why is is too controversial to protect our prison guards from the most violent of inmates?

As a member of the subcommittee that has oversight responsibilites for the Bureau of Prisons, I have listened to testimony describing the brutal murders of prison guards by inmates already serving life sentences for other brutal murders. These violent killers, who have killed before—often a number of times—have nothing to lose in killing again. There is no deterrent. They cannot get a worse punishment than the life sentence they are already serving.

Mr. Speaker, I can think of no better or more shocking example of the need for a constitutional death penalty than this situation. We cannot allow this to continue. We owe our prison guards more protection than we are giving them now. We cannot tolerate "open season" on prison guards by these inhuman killers. Let us pass a constitutional death penalty.

HOUSE ACTION NEEDED ON CRIME REFORM LEGISLATION

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, very seldom do issues present themselves before this Congress which should draw unanimous, bipartisan concern for immediate action. When they do, there is an unusual effort to deal with them. This is why I am a bit confused now over the House Democrat leadership's refusal to allow any portion of the President's crime package to come to the floor for consideration.

I understand that there are several points in the 42-point proposal that are controversial. But there are also many more points which would institute badly needed reforms on our Federal Criminal Code. It has been almost 14 years since Congress last acted on this issue.

It is interesting to note that the other body was able to separate some of the more controversial points of the crime package and pass almost unanimously a crime reform bill. It seems to me that if Senator THURMOND and Senator KENNEDY can come to an agreement that produces action, we should be able to do likewise in this House.

Concern for crime is widespread. It is shared by conservatives and liberals; Republicans and Democrats; the rich and the poor. There is nothing to be gained by preventing this issue a fair hearing. There is everything to lose by failing to act.

I would hate for my constituents to think that the House leadership did not care about this issue—it is so important to them. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to please reconsider and allow this package to come to the floor.

PRESIDENT'S HISTORIC MISSION TO CHINA

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States is now embarked on a historic mission to the large, great country of China. This event is a natural follow-up to the breakthrough that was made by President Nixon in his time, in which the foreign policy decision was made that neither the United States nor the free world could afford isolating that great area of the world.

Now is the time for every American citizen to pray for the success of that mission, not only to open up these new channels of trade and diplomatic exchanges that are just a natural outcome of such visitations, but also because recognizing the mass of people that China represents and its station in the world and in the posture of peacemaking as we should know it, this is a grand opportunity for the United States of America to weld together new ties that can guarantee peace in our time and peace in the next time for our children.

WEAK FEDERAL BAIL LAWS

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, on November 27, 1982, George Gibbs was taken into Federal custody for robbery of the Detroit Teachers Credit Union. That robbery was a violent one as Gibbs pistol-whipped the credit union security officer and held a gun to the head of a teller threatening to kill her. The evidence against George Gibbs was strong as he was in possession of the pistol he had stolen from the security guard at the time he was arrested—he was in a stolen car, incidently—and Gibbs was positively identified by two victims.

Despite the fact that the U.S. attorney's office for the Eastern District of Michigan urged a high bail in light of the danger that Gibbs posed to the community, the U.S. magistrate ruled that bail is intended solely to assume appearance at trial and set bail at $25,000, 10 percent cash. The U.S. attorney's office appealed this ruling to the U.S. district judge who modified the magistrate's order to require a $25,000 cash bond but otherwise refused to overturn the ruling of the magistrate.

On December 2, Gibbs made bail. Four days later, Gibbs and a partner held up the Fidelity Bank of Southfield, a suburb of Detroit. During the course of the robbery, Gibbs struck a teller and threatened to kill an assistant manager. In fleeing the scene, Gibbs and his partner were pursued by Officer Robert Diegel, a lone officer in a police scout car. A shootout occurred in which Officer Diegel was wounded. Gibbs was approaching the wounded officer, apparently intent upon killing Officer Diegel, when other Southfield officers arrived on the scene arresting Gibbs and his partner. Had they arrived seconds later, Officer Diegel would have been a statistic today.

There have been far too many cases like that of George Gibbs because of weak Federal bail laws. The citizens of this Nation and our law enforcement officers deserve better from the Congress of the United States. We must stop the revolving door that current bail laws have created. We must enact President Reagan's bail reform measures in H.R. 2151.

THE SOLAR MAX REPAIR MISSION

(Mr. CHANDLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise also today to congratulate the crew of the space shuttle Challenger and the whole NASA team for the successful completion of the solar Max repair mission. This success confirms that the space shuttle is, indeed, the primary component in a new era of commerical and scientific outer space utilization.

That the crew of the Challenger was able to repair and extend the life of the Solar Max satellite is, of course, a boon to solar flare research. More importantly, this mission proves that the shuttle can perform one of its primary missions: the repair and deployment of satellites while in orbit. Previously, when a satellite was crippled by a simple problem like a blown fuse, the opportunity to extend human knowledge was lost, along with a lot of effort and money. Now, the space shuttle, along with a new generation of satellites designed to be repaired in orbit, will eliminate this waste. It is estimated that repairing the Solar Max cost only one-quarter of the replacement cost of this satellite. Also, the need for expensive backup components on satellites has largely vanished in the face of the shuttle's proven ability to perform repairs.

Finally, I would like to commend the whole shuttle team for the perseverance and ingenuity they showed in solving the problems which arose at the beginning of the mission. This further proves now invaluable the shuttle's versatility is to America's success in space.

WE NEED CERTAINTY AND SWIFTNESS IN SENTENCING PROCESS

(Mr. McCOLLUM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, in recent years a number of criminologists have issued statements or declarations indicating their belief that deterrence no longer should be considered a goal of sentencing in the criminal laws. I think that is an absurd conclusion, but I understand why some might reach this conclusion is because we no longer have certainty and swiftness in our sentencing process. We do not carry out the sentences once they are given, so how can we expect any criminals or would-be criminals to be deterred.

What we must do is put that certainty and swiftness back into our sentences again. What happens is that after a State court conviction and the sentence occurs, an appeal is taken all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court. Once that has been upheld, the sentence and the conviction, then we see the criminal going back into Federal district court seeking another avenue of relief through habeas corpus petitions, usually claiming that he was not represented adequately by counsel.

That is appealed all the way again to the U.S. Supreme Court. Then he is back into Federal district court again, and the process goes on and some other issue again and again and again and again.

There is a bill that is in the Criminal Justice Subcommittee of this Congress that has been there for some time that would remedy this problem. It is endorsed by all of the attorneys general of all the States of the Union, and by the U.S. Attorney General, but that bill, which would limit the opportunity for the criminal to do this repetitive kind of going back into the Federal district court again and again, is being held up by the Democratic leadership of this House. It is not being allowed to come out for a vote. It is a part of the President's criminal package. We ought to demand that it come out for a vote now and solve this problem.

CONGRESS: BAG IT

(Mr. WEBER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous material.)

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, for several months now we have heard rumors that the majority intends either in this session or the next session of Congress to launch an attack on the people's right to know by restricting C-SPAN coverage of the Congress and the video taping thereof. We now find that there is substance to those rumors, and that the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee intends at some future date to submit a rules change that would, in effect, force the censure of any Member who used video taping of the House proceedings in his campaign.

In response to this attack on the people's right to know, the Washington Post today editorialized in an editorial entitled, "Congress: Bag It!" with a suggestion. They said, and we quote:

> We have another suggestion. Any member of the Congress who doesn't want his constituents to know what he says on the floor of the House should follow the example of undercover witnesses hiding out from mobsters or of spies defecting from the KGB. You've seen these people testifying before committees with paper bags over their heads—very dramatic.

Continuing to quote the Post, they say:

> Why couldn't House members adopt this simple, inexpensive practice themselves? Before they get to the microphones or the well of the House, they could simply cover their heads with a hood, ski mask or brown bag and speak through one of those voice-distorting devices.

Mr. Speaker, it would be funny if it were not so sad. The attack is not on the minority; the attack is on the people's right to know, and this is only the first step.

The full editorial follows:

CONGRESS: BAG IT!

Members of the House of Representatives are in high dudgeon, and no wonder. Candidates running against them—and maybe even some colleagues as well—are planning to resort to a campaign tactic that is widely regarded as foul play. Following the example of one G. Douglas Stephens, who ran against and nearly upset House Republican Leader Robert Michel in 1982, they are planning to use videotape segments of the incumbents speaking before the House. These tapes have been broadcast by C-SPAN (with cameras controlled by the House) for six years, but Mr. Stephens was the first candidate dastardly enough actually to broadcast a clip of what his opponent was saying in an open session of the House. Can you imagine? He has a nerve.

Mr. Stephens was following what some House members may regard as a long road downhill from the golden days of the 18th century, when the British House of Commons prohibited any report of what was said in debate. To get around that ban, the story goes, publishers sent to the galleries reporters capable of memorizing two or three hours of debate and writing it down, with quill pens, immediately afterward. The videotapes are today's technological equivalent of those reporters, and they are even more reliable than the Congressional Record, in which members can correct, revise, extend and greatly pretty up their remarks. That seems to irk some congressmen, who want to discipline members or successful challengers who use the tapes.

We have another suggestion. Any member of Congress who doesn't want his constituents to know what he says on the floor of the House should follow the example of undercover witnesses hiding out from mobsters or of spies defecting from the KGB. You've seen these people testifying before committees with paper bags over their heads—very dramatic.

Why couldn't House members adopt this simple, inexpensive and efficient practice themselves? Before they get to the microphones or the well of the House, they could simply cover their heads with a hood, ski mask or brown bag and speak through one of those voice-distorting devices. That way they could always deny that they were the ones in the videotape. Surely the voters wouldn't object—unless they have some crazy idea that they are entitled to know what their representatives are saying in Congress.

THE EXCLUSIONARY RULE

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, the good news: A Federal Express employee alerted narcotics agents when he found a number of bags of white powder in a broken package. The agents tested that powder and found that it was cocaine. Based on this evidence, they got a search warrant for the property of the consignee and convicted a ring of dope smugglers.

The bad news: A Federal court reversed the conviction, arguing that the agents should have gotten a search warrant even to test the powder.

Society cannot survive when its people are forced to live under illogical rules of this type. If we do not do something about the exclusionary rule, we will find ourselves looking for other work.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you to allow the Senate-passed bill to come to the floor of the House at once.

THE SPENDING PRIORITIES OF THE HOUSE

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, during yesterday's debate I attempted to raise the question of whether this House has any sense of spending priorities whatsoever. Before our colleague, the gentlewoman from Maryland (Ms. MIKULSKI), cut off my opportunity to fully debate this issue, evidently because she did not like to hear the kind of wasteful spending that may be going on, I sought to point out that we were increasing the deficit in order to fund programs of at least questionable description.

Let us be clear. Yesterday a majority of this House voted for an add-on deficit to fund the National Science Foundation despite the fact that they were told that the money was likely to be spent on programs which most Americans would find unbelievable. Among the programs funded thus far with these moneys are $120,000 to study the nervous system of leeches, $55,000 to study interaction in telephone surveys, $61,000 for something called extrinsic constraints and intrinsic motivation, $61,000 to study the equilibria of games, and $19,000 to study the social ecology of free-ranging coyotes.

Maybe there is some merit in some of these studies—maybe. But the question is, should we be adding to our national deficit to fund such efforts?

Anyone who voted for the add-on deficit to pay for that kind of spending cannot be trusted with the public purse. Interestingly, when I examine the record, I find that many of the people who voted for the deficit add-on yesterday are the same people who voted to raise their own pay just 2 weeks ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SMITH of Florida). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) has expired.

THE LEGENDARY CHICAGO CUBS IN THEIR QUEST FOR FIRST PLACE

(Mr. HILLIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, before we proceed in discussing ponderous issues such as El Salvador, the Federal deficit, and the Vermont caucus, I think we need to take the time to recognize a truly extraordinary event.

Tuesday night, at 11:07 p.m. Washington time, the Chicago Cubs defeated the St. Louis Cardinals 3 to 2 and moved into sole possession of first place in the National League's eastern division.

I was going to say something about this yesterday during the 1 minute, but my schedule did not allow it. That was too bad because last night the Cubs lost to the Cardinals and fell out of first. Glory has always been a brief and fleeting thing for the Cubs.

The misfortunes and miscues of the Cubs are legendary in the annals of baseball. The lovable losers of Wrigley Field always find a way to snatch defeat from the jaws of certain victory.

Over the years, their incompetence has won the hearts of millions from coast to coast. You have never really enjoyed the essence of the national pastime until you have watched the Cubs blow a five-run lead in the ninth.

But what would happen if the Thomas Deweys of baseball actually started to win? What would happen to the thousands of foul weather fans who always vote for Harold Stassen, own Corvairs and build their homes on the San Andreas fault?

Who will they turn to in their hour of need? The Seattle Mariners?

TELEPHONE ACCESS CHARGES ARE BAD NEWS FOR AMERICAN BUSINESS

(Mr. WYDEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago 184 of our colleagues joined the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. CRAIG) and I in a letter requesting the Federal Communications Commission to hold off on imposing telephone access charges on our Nation's businesses. If these charges go into effect now at their present rate of $6 a month per line, many of our Nation's small businesses will pay more for the privilege of having the opportunity to make long distance calls than they would pay for the long distance calls that they actually make.

Mr. Speaker, originally supporters of telephone access charges on our businesses said that long distance rates would go down by 10 percent or more if access charges were implemented, but last weekend in an interview with the Washington Post FCC Chairman Fowler said that any rate reductions would be far less.

Mr. Speaker, the present plan to put access telephone charges on small businesses is bad news, and if implemented it surely would hamper the effort to stimulate economic growth in our country.

ADMINISTRATION SUPPORTS CONTROVERSIAL NSF RESEARCH PROJECTS

(Mr. BROWN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I regret that my good friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, decided to take up the issue of the titles of research projects again this morning, as he did yesterday. I think he has weakened his own case in doing so, and I hope he will reconsider his arguments.

He has a legitimate argument against a bill which goes beyond the President's request. It is not a very good argument, but it is legitimate. Each one of the research projects within that bill, however, has been carefully screened by appointees of the President, and they represent the best science that is available today. I have commended the administration for this improvement and for its commitment to the quality of the science that is being supported by the NSF.

The items which were above the President's budget were none of these research projects. Instead, they were for the funding of advanced computer capability in universities, and for additional fellowships for graduate training in science. Now, these can legitimately be attacked, and they were on the floor, but for the gentleman to attack research projects indiscriminately because he does not like their titles shows an unawareness of the significance of the research represented by these titles. The first one he mentioned, for example, involving the nervous system of the leech, is typical. Considerable observation of the nervous systems of lower animals has resulted in choosing the leech as an organism with a simple, easily observed system from which much can be learned about how stimuli are transmitted in the nervous system of higher animals, including humans. Based on this research major new knowledge has been acquired relevant to the human brain and nervous system. The lowly leech has contributed to the betterment of mankind in many surprising ways, as good science generally does, even though we may not always know how that will happen.

AN UPDATE ON CRIME LEGISLATION BEFORE THE CONGRESS

(Mr. HUGHES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of rhetoric in this Chamber in the last couple of days about crime, much of which I think has some merit but a great deal of which is confusing and has absolutely no merit whatsoever.

My colleague, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. SHAW), I think, made a very good point about bail reform, and I share his sentiments about the need to put into the law provisions which would enable the court to take into account danger to the community.

Unfortunately, our Subcommittee on Crime, of which my colleague is a distinguished member, does not have jurisdiction over that particular provision, and that is somewhat controversial and we are having some difficulty with it. But for the Members to suggest, for instance, that the exclusionary rule and habeas corpus and the death penalty are in the President's Omnibus Crime Control Act indicates to me that they have not, first of all, read the bill.

For Members to come into this well and suggest that this Congress is not passing major crime legislation is absolutely baseless. We have a major bill over in the other body that has been gathering dust since May of last year. It is called the Justice Assistance Act of 1983. If you ask the International District Attorneys Association, the National Association of Attorneys General, the International Chiefs of Police, and local law enforcement agencies around the country what their No. 1 priority is, they would tell you the Justice Assistance Act.

Well over 90 percent of street crime is within the jurisdiction of local police—not Federal agencies—and the justice assistance bill provides much needed assistance to our local agencies.

Mr. Speaker, today we marked up another one of the items of the President's crime package, the Diversion Control Act. That and about five other measures are moving through the legislative process and will be before the Congress in the coming days. Measures such as credit card fraud, computer crime, trademark counterfeiting, and subpena powers for the President's Crime Commission are being processed by the Subcommittee on Crime.

In addition the Congress has passed and the President has signed an antitampering bill. Child pornography, the so-called drug czar, extradition reform, and pharmacy robbery are all moving through the Congress. Let us lower the rhetoric and keep crime a nonpartisan issue.

THE MANDATORY SCHOOL PRAYER AMENDMENT

(Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, during this week we have again heard from the minority and from the President suggestions that the House release what they refer to as the voluntary school prayer amendment.

What both the minority and the President forget to tell this House and the American people is, first, the school prayer they support is not voluntary, rather it is mandatory. We now have voluntary school prayer in the United States. The Constitution of the United States allows that. What they support is mandatory school prayer; the Government shall write or designate the writing of a prayer, and then students in the class must say that prayer. That is mandatory school prayer.

The second thing they forget to tell us is that the Senate just considered this mandatory school prayer amendment and overwhelmingly turned it down, both Republicans and Democrats, as they should have. They have, therefore, protected the rights of American schoolchildren to voluntary school prayer.

SILENT PRAYER A VIOLATION OF PRINCIPLE

(Mr. KINDNESS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the necessity arises once again to correct the impressions created by those who are against prayer in the schools. To speak of voluntary prayer only in terms of silence is a violation of the principle, if not the letter, of the first amendment right that we all have to freedom of speech. For freedom of speech to extend freely to discussions of Marxism or Leninism or a variety of economic theories, but not to extend to words of prayer is a reprehensible thought, it seems to me, a concept that we cannot abide in our free society, much less support with specious arguments.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF S. 2570, TO CONTINUE TRANSITION PROVISIONS OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT UNTIL MAY 26, 1984

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 490 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 490

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider in the House, without intervening motion, the bill (S. 2570) to continue the transition provisions of the Bankruptcy Act until May 26, 1984, and for other purposes, said bill shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MOAKLEY) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT), and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the rule provides for the consideration of a bill received from the Senate (S. 2570) which will extend existing bankruptcy law for an additional 25 days.

Neither the bill nor the rule is completely without controversy, Mr. Speaker. But I think there is a general understanding that the Congress has rather little choice as regards the procedure recommended by the committee.

The rule provides for the immediate consideration of the Senate bill, in the House. As Members understand, this procedure is similar to a closed rule.

The process of revising bankruptcy law, to comply with the Supreme Court ruling in the Marathon case, has been very difficult. I think the Members are quite familiar with both the procedural and the political history. Nevertheless, it is probably appropriate to outline the current situation.

In June 1982, the Supreme Court ruled that the article I judgeships, under the 1978 bankruptcy law, were unconstitutional.

During the brief period left in the previous Congress, after that ruling, efforts were made to resolve the issue legislatively, but were unsuccessful.

During the present Congress, the issue has become quite difficult because of a dispute over the issue of reconstituting the bankruptcy courts as article III courts, as recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, or revising the courts' authorities to make article I courts acceptable, within the terms of the Supreme Court ruling.

The progress of the legislation was also made more difficult by disputes over changes in bankruptcy law proposed to be offered as amendments to the court bill.

Mr. Speaker, during most of this Congress, a transition rule, issued by the Federal judiciary, has made it possible for bankruptcy law to continue to be administered under the supervision of the district courts.

However, the 1978 law contains a sunset which made it impossible for the interim rule to operate beyond March 31 of this year.

By the time that deadline loomed, both the House and the Senate had agreed to bills on the subject. The broad outlines of the final positions of the two Houses are quite similar. Both Houses had agreed to codify a system similar to the existing interim rule and both Houses had agreed to make some changes in bankruptcy law. However, there are differences between those changes and a question over the creation of some additional article III judgeships, as proposed by the Senate.

These issues remained in negotiation when the final deadline of March 31 approached. On March 30, both Houses handled legislation to extend that deadline by 30 days, and the President signed the bill.

During the period of the extension, negotiations similar to a conference have been in progress. However, neither House has formally acted on the bills proposed by the other, so a formal conference cannot be appointed.

In anticipation of the Easter district work period, the majority leader in the other body submitted a bill (S. 2570) to allow a further modest extension of 25 days. At the other body's request, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary attempted to present that bill to the House on the evening of April 12 but unanimous consent was not obtained.

The Committee on Rules met yesterday for the purpose of providing a procedure to consider the bill and has recommended a rather expedited rule that will enable the House to handle this simple extension.

I am aware of no controversy over the rule, except for a request made by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS), to make in order a nongermane amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I think I am required to place into the record, my impression of the general attitude of the Rules Committee in acting on this resolution. I do not think the committee feels it has any choice in the matter now before the House.

However, I think the attitude of the committee is fully in accord with the general concensus of this body. The major issues concerned in bankruptcy have been fought out. And the positions of the two bodies on the major issues are not too dissimilar.

It is now time to resolve the bankruptcy issue, either by conference or otherwise, and to place the matter before the two houses for final action.

Mr. Speaker, I am simply not in a position to assure the House that S. 2570 is the final extension that will be handled before that final resolution. But I think everyone involved understands the general mood of the Congress, and the committee and the House can be expected to face subsequent extensions with increasing reluctance.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great reluctance that I rise in support of this rule. But, true to form, we are up against yet another bankruptcy court deadline. This whole scenario is beginning to make the "Perils of Pauline" look like a Sunday snooze cruise on a slow boat to nowhere.

We have been jerking the Federal bankruptcy courts around like a yo-yo ever since June of 1982 when the Supreme Court ruled in the Marathon case that the existing system was unconstitutional. At that time the Court gave Congress until October 4, 1982, to correct the situation; and, when we did not, the Court further extended the deadline to December 24. Still there was no congressional solution. When the Court denied another stay, the Judicial Conference issued an interim, emergency rule under which the bankruptcy courts have been operating ever since.

Mr. Speaker, in February of last year our House Judiciary Committee reported its bankruptcy bill, H.R. 3, but that bill reposed in the Rules Committee for over a year due to the chairman's reluctance to take his chances with some amendments he did not want. In the interim, the other body passed its bankruptcy bill, S. 1013, in April of last year.

The House deadlock was finally broken this past March when the Judiciary chairman agreed to a compromise that would include the consumer bankruptcy provisions as well as his own labor bankruptcy provisions, and a rule that would permit the offering of the Kindness-Kastenmeier bankruptcy court alternative—placing the courts under the district courts, rather than providing for life-tenured judges. That was the version that finally prevailed in the House on March 21 of this year—just 9 short days away from the potential collapse of the whole bankruptcy system.

When there was no quick compromise forthcoming between the House and Senate versions, the other body sent us a 30-day statutory extension of the interim rule on March 30, and that was passed and signed by the President.

Now, here we are back again on another extension request—this one that would carry us to May 25. And I have no doubt there are some who came out on the short end of the court system dispute last month who would like to continue with these extensions right into the next Congress, in hopes of getting a better shake.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I for one want to put those parties on notice here and now that this darn well better be the last extension of this sort. This House is not going to stand for much more of this little yo-yo derby in which the string jerkers come crying to us at the last minute that their string will snap unless we extend it just a little bit more. The American people do not want a Congress that plays with yo-yo's; they want a Congress that will take decisive action and put our bankruptcy courts on a sound and permanent footing once and for all.

Mr. Speaker, the rule we are considering clearly reflects the emergency nature of this situation if we are to get a bill to the President overseas to meet this deadline. The rule provides for the consideration of S. 2570 in the House instead of the Committee of the Whole, meaning no amendments will be in order. The rule does provide for 1-hour of general debate to be divided between the chairman and ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee, whereas ordinarily a bill considered in the House is controlled exclusively by the manager under the hour rule. The rule also preserves the right of the minority to offer a motion to recommit—something which the Rules Committee cannot deny under House Rules. But otherwise, this is a pretty airtight rule.

Mr. Speaker, let me say again in conclusion that I reluctantly support this rule and unusual procedure as necessary to extract ourselves from this self-inflicted emergency situation. But I again want to make clear that we clearly expect this to be the last extension and therefore urge those negotiating on the bankruptcy bill to resolve their differences within this additional 25-day period.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS).

Mr. KINDNESS. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time.

I would like to make it clear first of all that I do not oppose this rule. As a matter of fact, I support this rule. I support it because it is what we have, that is what we have to deal with.

I would like to have seen a rule that would have brought the matter before the Committee of the Whole House, that would have allowed at least an amendment to be considered. I take this time on the debate of the rule to describe the situation for the same purpose that I asked to be heard by the Rules Committee yesterday about the matter.

We have played around with bankruptcy long enough. We have played around with the matter of how the bankruptcy courts will be structured and what the judges will be like. That part of it has a time factor affecting it. That part ought to have been settled before now. It really should be settled now.

That is why we have to have the time extension, however, because, again, time has run out on us.

There are other matters, substantive matters, bankruptcy law changes that do not have any time element really affecting them. So why should we not today, instead of simply voting to extend the time of the present arrangement of the bankruptcy courts in this temporary status, instead of just doing that, why should we not amend the bill that will be brought before us by this rule, amend it so as to vote again on exactly what the House voted on before with respect to the bankruptcy judges and the procedure and how the bankruptcy courts will operate, not the substantive matters, just the bankruptcy court part of it?

If we do that again, just as we have done before by a good margin, that would then be sending over to the other body a clear opportunity for the other body as well as this House to separate out those two types of problems: the bankruptcy courts problem on the one hand and the substantive matters on the other hand.

The controversy is with the labor contract provisions and the consumer bankruptcy provisions and what should be added or subtracted from those, all of which have been subject to a very small degree, if any, of hearings and study in either House. So why do we not do what we know we are doing, what we know what to do with, the court's part?

If we are confronted with another request for an extension of time I think a very strong move should develop to say "no," this time we are going to try to do just what I have described, to amend the bill that extends the time again, if the Rules Committee will but give us that opportunity, and to clearly separate out from the other substantive matters this one thing that does have to be dealt with, should have been dealt with a long time ago, and it has been held up unmercifully. It should be dealt with today for that matter.

We could, I think, have had an interesting opportunity to just end all of the unreasonableness of the handling of the bankruptcy matter. We could have brought it back into the area of reason and rationality. The House and Senate versions are not very different.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDNESS. I yield to the gentleman from California briefly.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I think it should be made clear, and I know the gentleman form Ohio agrees with me, that this is exactly what the Judiciary Committee did more than a year ago, in February 1983. It sent to the Rules Committee the bill passed by and reported favorably by the House Judiciary Committee with a request for an open rule at that time, and it has lain in the Rules Committee for more than a year because of requests for certain nongermane amendments.

Mr. KINDNESS. I appreciate the gentleman's contribution. I guess I must have failed to get my point across because what I have been attempting to say is that now that we have reached this stage in the procedure where the other body says we cannot get all of these problems resolved in time, before the deadline runs out, then let us extend that time.

I am saying let us send them a message back that says look, we have both Houses having acted once on this matter and let us deal with the court's part of it and put the rest aside to be dealt with as the gentleman would prefer, I would take it.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. I think also the gentleman from Ohio realizes that that is an impractical suggestion because the President must sign the bill. He is in China. As a matter of fact, if we pass the bill today a special trip will have to be made; a special airplane must be sent at great expense from Washington, D.C. to Shanghai so that the President can sign the bill.

Mr. KINDNESS. Again, I believe the gentleman may have information that differs from the information I have, which does not coincide with what has just been stated, that the logistics for the handling of the President's signature would relate to another geographic location and would not require a trip to China.

But no matter what the subject matter that is taken up or the scope of it with regard to bankruptcy today, we have got to have the President's signature before the time runs out. And it would be a lot simpler to do if we are just dealing with the bankruptcy court and procedure part and not these other matters that are goofing up the process.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDNESS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I think the gentleman from California also forgets that available to the Judiciary Committee was the Calendar Wednesday procedure on many, many weeks during this session where the Rules Committee could have been bypassed, where the Judiciary Committee could have called this bill to the floor and refused to do so.

Specifically the Judiciary Committee chairman could have come to the floor, called the bill up, and he refused to do so. So the Rules Committee was not the holdup. In fact, the holdup was the fact that the Judiciary Committee was trying to work out their own deal.

Mr. KINDNESS. No question about it, this matter has been dealt with in a shabby manner. It is about time we started to get the bankruptcy courts operating on a predictable basis. Let these other issues be compromised or dealt with as best they can be, but they are completely aside from the basic problem of getting our bankruptcy courts in order and operating, and that is what we really should be dealing with today, not just an extension of time, but getting that matter permanently decided and then let these other matters then be negotiated back room, front room, wherever it is going to be done, I do not care. Let us have our bankruptcy courts operating.

But the next time we come back here with a consideration of an extension of time for this temporary circumstance, there is going to be a firestorm of protest. And we ought to be doing just what I am suggesting we should be doing today.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MOAKLEY) has any time he would like to yield.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, this side has no more requests for time.

□ 1220

Mr. LOTT. I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I would like to make just one point in response to the gentleman from California's comments about the bill reposing in the Rules Committee for over a year.

You know, I do not know how much blame the Rules Committee may or may not accept in that process.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I had the impression, was trying to keep it from being moved because of some so-called nongermane amendments that were being requested. But I would remind the gentleman that the Rules Committee is still controlled by his side; by the Democratic leadership and by a membership that is 2 to 1 plus 1. It could have been moved anytime the gentleman wanted it moved over there, but the gentleman did not see fit to do it. So we are not going to be shifting that blame to other pieces of legislation. It could have been moved.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER).

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable reluctance that I rise in opposition to the rule this morning, simply because it is another closed rule that is being brought up to consider a Judiciary Committee bill. If it is not bankruptcy extensions or bankruptcy substantive legislation, or the equal rights amendment or immigration legislation or what have you, it seems that the Judiciary Committee is scared to bring bills up with an open rule so that amendments can be offered and debated and voted on by the House of Representatives.

Part of the legislative process in a deliberative body is to allow the House to work its will on amendments. And again, the Judiciary Committee wants to short-circuit the amending procedure so that we have to consider this bill as presented either up or down without so much as changing a jot or a tittle.

Now some would ask, why should I get excited about this particular piece of legislation that is merely an extension of time? Well, if the Members will look at their calendars, May 25 is midnight Friday of the time that we are supposed to go out for the Memorial Day recess.

As the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT) has indicated in the course of his remarks, the consideration of bankruptcy legislation has been a history of a game of legislative chicken and we do not legislate on bankruptcy until our backs are up against the deadline.

Now, having the date of May 25 contained in this piece of legislation will mean that we will probably be here until 11:59 p.m. Friday night, May 25, resolving this problem.

And I think the Members ought to be advised that that is the deadline that is contained in that bill and make their plane reservations home for the Memorial Day weekend on Saturday morning rather than on Friday or on Thursday night, because you know and I know that the Judiciary Committee is not going to be able to resolve the substantive matter of bankruptcy until we are having the clock strike 12 and the deadline be upon us.

Now, I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi that this extension is necessary. I wish we could amend this bill to have the deadline a couple of days earlier so that we are not backing up against a weekend when everybody is going out of town and we can consider this issue with a clear head and on the merits rather than the fact that we have all got obligations in our district on this major Federal holiday.

Now, why are we here? We are here because the game of legislative chicken has been played on bankruptcy which the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT) has adequately outlined. But there is also one other factor that has not been talked about on this floor relative to the obstruction and the obfuscation by the Democratic majority on the House Judiciary Committee.

And that is that they wanted the President of the United States to appoint 227 new article III bankruptcy judges, but they did not want this President of the United States to do it. So all of this delay has been going on for months and months to back us up against the Presidential election so that that President who will be elected next November 6 will make the appointments rather than this President.

Well, I think that shows how hollow all of their statements are that there is a bankruptcy court emergency. If there was an emergency, we could have dealt with this earlier on. We do not need to bring this up under a closed rule.

The May 25 date is asking for trouble. And I would hope that this rule would be voted down so that at least we could be able to consider an earlier date.

I think the gentleman from Mississippi for the time.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. MCCOLLUM).

Mr. MCCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, I am not up here to oppose the rule. Like others who have spoken, I think we should support it. I think it is an important thing to move on.

Nor am I up here to yell a lot of criticism about the handling of this bankruptcy matter, though I certainly have been vocal about the time delays involved for some time.

I simply want to take the opportunity to urge my colleagues and those on the committee and those dealing with whatever kind of final product comes out of the conference that goes on this bill to seriously look at one matter that is not in our bill that the other body has in its.

That is a matter affecting several thousands of Americans, particularly a lot of senior citizens, a matter called time-share ownership.

There are people today who buy a very new form of property ownership, an opportunity to use a condominium, to use a hotel facility, to use some resort in my State of Florida and many other areas of the country where there are these facilities, for say a week out of a year every year. They purchase that opportunity for many years to come. They pay their money down. They have that absolute right to use it, as long as that building or that facility or that condominium exists for what ever length of time is agreed on—say 30 years or 100 years.

But under the present bankruptcy laws, a great many of these, most of these people, are not protected if the developer goes bankrupt. And I think it is exceedingly important because we are talking about people who are usually not that well to do who have invested a small portion of their savings in order to have a vacation every year or in order to have an opportunity to come to Florida in the winter, in order to have a piece of property but it is not considered to be owned, technically to be protected by the current bankruptcy laws. And I truly believe that a remedy to this failure of the bankruptcy laws needs immediate attention—at the very least hearings this spring on pending legislation.

But more importantly, if we could expedite it in the conference on this pending legislation, we would all be better off. I take this opportunity of debate to raise the issue again of timeshare ownership and protection under the bankruptcy laws and again urge my colleagues to get on with all of this legislation. It is critical.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. LUNGREN), a member of the committee.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, this rule I guess is necessary to do what has to be done as we find ourselves here again dealing with the bankruptcy bill. It ought to be made crystal clear that we are at a constitutional crisis not because anything the Senate has done, not because anything the President has done, not because anything Members on this side of the aisle have attempted to do, but because the leadership on the other side decided they would hold this bill up for 13 months after we passed it out of our committee last year.

And then within 28 days of the Supreme Court making a unanimous decision with respect to the standard to be utilized in abrogating collective bargaining agreements when a company has filed a chapter 11 for reorganization, we then had to attach something that had no hearings whatsoever, had never been considered by any subcommittee or committee of this House. That is the reason why it is being hung up.

On the Senate side, they thought that if you are going to make a 180-degree change in what the Supreme Court has decided in interpreting the law, you ought to at least have a hearing. So they need some days to have some hearings on this.

That is why we are asking for almost 30 days. The fact of the matter is the easy way to solve this problem would be to drop out the whole question of the Bildisco decision and allow that to come under the normal procedure. But evidently that is not going to happen.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, since we have moved with such dispatch on the question dealing with the labor unions' concern, I would like to direct to the Chair a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, it deals with a piece of legislation that has come out of the same committee and is a variation of H.R. 3635, the Child Protection Act of 1983, which we passed 400 to 1 on November 11, 1983.

There was an agreement worked out between the Members of the House and the Senate for a compromise. That went to the Senate. They passed our version, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and it is my information that H.R. 3635 was sent to the Speaker's desk from the Senate on April 2 or 3 of this year.

My parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker, is: Is H.R. 3635 presently at the Speaker's desk?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, does that mean that the Senate amendment, H.R. 3635, has not yet been referred to a committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LUNGREN. And can the Chair inform me at this time and inform the House as to what procedure might be available to us at this time to allow for immediate consideration of that Senate amendment?

□ 1230

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would advise the gentleman that the Chair would only recognize for a request by the chairman or another member if authorized by the committee.

Mr. LUNGREN. Authorization of the committee, that means authorization of the Democratic leadership?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Authorization of the committee.

Mr. LUNGREN. Does the Chair mean that it takes an official vote of the committee or an agreement by the chairman of the committee itself?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Speaker would look to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LUNGREN. And failing that, the only other way to bring it up would be under a unanimous-consent request by a Member of this body?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the Speaker for that information.

I would just point at this time that this speaks very poorly about this House. This is the third or fourth time we have revisited this to get another extension.

So here we are revisiting this question of bankruptcy. It is the court situation that has to be dealt with. We all know that, but we knew that 13 months ago when we passed it out of the Judiciary Committee. It was held in abeyance because members of the leadership on the other side did not want us to deal with other issues. But once the Supreme Court made their decision with respect to major labor unions in this country, that whole question changed and legislation concerning it was forced on us within 28 days of the Supreme Court decision.

In contrast, a very serious question, about which there is bipartisan support, the Child Protection Act, better known as the child pornography bill languishes at the Speaker's desk for a month while we take care of other less significant legislation—I am not referring to this as insignificant—but other pieces of legislation that certainly do not have the priority that that ought to have.

One just has to question what are the priorities in this House when I have been instructed by the Speaker today the Democratic chairman, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, could bring up the child pornography bill at any time. We have not done it since April 2, even though it has been available to us. But at the same time we again and again court the major labor unions of this country by making sure that we do not do anything they would consider to be even the slightest insult. We now have to jump through this hoop again because we need 30 days to investigate what it is we did. Most Members, I am sure, are not fully aware of what it is we did when we passed this bankruptcy bill just a few weeks ago, because major portions had no hearings. We had no report, and basically we were working on guesswork.

Mr. Speaker, even though I do not object to this rule, I think it is a sad comment on the way this House is operating at the present time and unfortunately, a very sad comment on the committee upon which I am privileged to serve, the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, what we have here is one more dark chapter in a very shabby legislative legacy and I think that the shabbiness of that legacy has been pointed out by what the gentleman from California has just said.

In other words, if you are a big labor boss and you want something out of this Congress you can get it within a few days out of the Judiciary Committee. If you are a parent worried about exposure of your children to pornography of the most disgusting kind, you cannot get action out of this Congress.

I think that says something very, very bad. It says something about the way we operate around here.

This rule says something, too. It is a closed rule, as the gentleman from Wisconsin has pointed out. And it is a closed rule which I would say with at least one apparent problem in the course of all of this maneuvering that goes on around here. This bill has a motion to recommit in it. A motion to recommit? This bill has not even been to committee. How in the world do you recommit something that has never been to committee in the first place?

It seems to me that at the very least the rule should have been drafted properly and we ought to have had a motion to commit because that is what it should really be. We are considering legislation here that has never even been considered in the Judiciary Committee.

And so the rule is flawed to begin with. But at least, at the very least, what we are doing is taking up the legislation under the regular legislative process.

What they wanted to do here about a week ago was they wanted to run this through by unanimous consent, not even have this kind of discussion, not even reveal to the American people the kind of shabbiness that goes on here. They want to run it through by unanimous consent and let it go at that.

At least, at least here on the floor today we are having a chance to discuss the things that got us into this very bleak situation, the kind of maneuvering, the kind of political deals, the kind of special interest power that has impacted on this whole process. At least we are seeing now one of the more visible examples of how Congress works by closed door and backroom politics. It is a good example of how the people have gotten forgotten in this body. It is a good example how we become a closed process around here rather than an open process.

I would hope that Members will vote against this rule. This rule, it seems to me, is a closed rule that once again shows how bad things have become in the House of Representatives.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, to respond to the earlier observation of the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT) I concur in the gentleman's views.

I am unable to enter a commitment on behalf of the leadership, the Committee on Rules, or the Committee on the Judiciary, which we might later be unable to honor.

But, I think the gentleman from Mississippi speaks for the entire committee, and we do not propose to simply filter an unlimited number of extensions down to the floor.

It is my hope that S. 2570 is the last bill of its type, and that the two Houses will act promptly to resolve all remaining issues on bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were— yeas 295, nays 47, not voting 91, as follows:

EDMUND S. MUSKIE FEDERAL BUILDING

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works and Transportation be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 2460) to designate a Federal building in Augusta, Maine, as the "Edmund S. Muskie Federal Building," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Maine (Mr. MCKERNAN).

Mr. McKERNAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge my colleagues to support my bill to name a Federal building in Augusta, Maine, in honor of former U.S. Senator Edmund S. Muskie.

Ed Muskie's political career has been an inspiration to those of us who have followed him in public service. He began his career as minority leader in the Maine State Legislature, and served two terms as Maine's Governor, and over two decades as U.S. Senator from the Pine Tree State. His career in public office culminated with his appointment to the position of Secretary of State under President Carter in 1980.

Ed Muskie made economic and environmental issues his specialty. He demonstrated his wisdom, compassion, and foresight by promoting economic growth while emphasizing the need for tough environmental protection laws. His work as Governor and Senator have proven invaluable for Maine and the Nation. Mr. Muskie was also gifted in the delicate work of foreign policy. His work on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee gave him the experience necessary to serve ably as Secretary of State until the end of the Carter administration.

I ask my colleagues to support the measure to name the Augusta, Maine Federal building in honor of one of the great statesmen of our times, Edmund S. Muskie.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Maine (Ms. SNOWE).

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Committee on Public Works and Transportation for passing this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of S. 2461, a bill introduced by my colleague from Maine, Representative MCKERNAN, designating the Federal building in Augusta, Maine, as the "Edmund S. Muskie Federal Building."

I am proud to be a cosponsor of legislation which seeks to honor a distinguished former Member of Congress and a great American statesman. 25 years ago, Ed Muskie came to Washington to serve our Nation as a U.S. Senator from Maine. But this was not the start of his career. As a State legislator and two-term Governor of Maine, Ed Muskie established a tradition of sensible and firm leadership, helping to guide the State of Maine into a new era of development. As a Senator, Ed Muskie exercised his wisdom for 22 years, leaving his mark on policies improving housing development, Government reform, and our environment.

As well-known as he is nationally for his leadership and dedication to his country—so well typified by his service as Secretary of State—Ed Muskie demonstrated his ability to listen, but also to make a stand where one was needed. With environment issues, in particular, Ed Muskie acknowledged problems emerging due to water pollution long before it became a trend to do so. On the issue of coastal development, he understood better than anyone the complexities created by economic development, on the one hand, and the preservation of our coastlines, on the other.

Perhaps no politician of this era better understood how important it is not to separate national issues from the people served by these decisions. Ed Muskie demonstrated better than anyone how leadership and correct decisionmaking can develop from thoughtful consideration and deliberation. It is fitting that we honor Ed Muskie by naming the Augusta Federal Building in his honor.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senater bill, as follows:

S. 2460

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Federal building located at 40 Western Avenue, Augusta, Maine, shall hereafter be named and designated as the "Edmund S. Muskie Federal Building". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such building shall be held to be a reference to the "Edmund S. Muskie Federal Building".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. YOUNG) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, S. 2460 will designated a Federal building in Augusta, Maine, the "Edmund S. Muskie Federal Building."

Edmund S. Muskie spent a distinguished career in public service: a member of the house of representatives in Maine, Governor of Maine, U.S. Senator from 1958 to 1980, and Secretary of State.

Edmund Muskie made a major contribution to the public welfare of this Nation by his distinguished work in the environmental field. He built an unparalleled record of legislation for the preservation of our essential air and water. I cite among these the Clean Air Act, the Clean Water Act, the Solid Waste Disposal Act, and the Toxic Substance Disposal Act.

Designation this building in Senator Muskie's honor is a fitting tribute to a distinguished American.

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege during my service in this great body to have served with many fine and able Representatives. I include among these a distinguished American, Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, a State legislator, an able Governor, a great Senator, and a dedicated Secretary of State.

I worked with Senator Muskie at close hand for a number of years through his role in the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works and my role in this House as a member of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation. I know of his dedication; his intelligence, and his ability. I know of contributions he made to economic development, budgetary policy, and environmental legislation. I support this bill with pleasure and urge its passage.●

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARGARET CHASE SMITH FEDERAL BUILDING

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works and Transportation be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 2461) to designate a Federal building in Bangor, Maine, as the "Margaret Chase Smith Federal Building," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentlewoman from Maine (Ms. SNOWE).

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this legislation, which would name the Federal building in Bangor, Maine after Margaret Chase Smith.

It is a fitting honor that we name a Government building after Margaret Chase Smith, for it was Government to which she devoted much of her life. Margaret Chase Smith served for 8 years in the House of Representatives, representing the district that I now am privileged to serve. She was elected to the U.S. Senate in 1948, and served in that body until 1972. Through all her years in Government, Margaret Chase Smith showed a great devotion to her constituents and to her country.

Of her many accomplishments, one of her most notable was when, in 1964, she was the first woman to be nominated for President at the national convention of either of our major political parties. It was her strong Senate record, and her reputation among her colleagues that made her one of the leading political figures through the 1950's and the 1960's.

Senator Smith was known for holding fast to her views, even in the face of adverse reaction. She is most remembered as the individual who stood up to McCarthyism. She authored a declaration of conscience in the Senate, and was responsible for calming some of the fears facing the country at that time.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House is considering this legislation to honor a fine legislator and an outstanding Maine women. I look forward to passage of this measure and the renaming of the Federal building as the Margaret Chase Smith Federal Building.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maine (Mr. MCKERNAN).

Mr. MCKERNAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I support the bill introduced by my colleagues from Maine, Congresswoman SNOWE, that would honor former Senator Margaret Chase Smith by naming the Federal Building in Bangor, Maine, for her.

Senator Smith's service to this country and to Maine included 8 years in the House of Representatives and 24 years in the Senate.

She was first elected in 1940, and for the next 32 years earned a reputation for courage and foresight. Margaret Chase Smith epitomized the independence and integrity of Maine people. She showed both men and women the need to think for themselves, and not to base their decisions on narrow concerns, but on what was best for their country.

Perhaps this was best exemplified by the courage she showed in taking a direct stand against the fear and mistrust that were characteristic of this country under the shadow of McCarthyism. Her speech delivered in Congress appealing to this country's reason, is considered to be one of the most eloquent and effective against McCarthy and the disunity of the times.

Mr. Speaker, Senator Smith received many honors through the years, and the people of Maine are proud of the service and energy she dedicated to this country and to her State. It is fitting that Congress pass legislation that would name the Federal building in Bangor, Maine, in honor of Margaret Chase Smith.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentlewoman from Maine and the gentleman from Maine.

I personally have been acquainted with Mrs. Smith, and know that there is no finer lady that has ever served in this great House.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 2461

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Federal building located at 202 Harlow Street, Bangor, Maine, shall hereafter be named and designated as the "Margaret Chase Smith Federal Building". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such building shall be held to be a reference to the "Margaret Chase Smith Federal Building".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. YOUNG) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, S. 2461, to designate a Federal building in Bangor, Maine, as the "Margaret Chase Smith Federal Building," honors a fine American for a long career of service to her State and her Nation. She served in the House of Representatives for 8½ years and in the Senate for 24 years. Her 32½ years of service are a shining example of dedication and honesty.

Margaret Chase Smith embodies all that is best from the New England soil from which she came and which she brought to her work in the Congress. Her unbroken record of 2,941 unmissed yea and nay rollcall votes is an indication of her ability to work.

Maine is honored when this building is named in her honor.

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, Margaret Chase Smith, a leader in congressional service, a leader in dedication to her profession, both as a Member of the House and Senate, in many ways one of the great beacons of conscience in the history of the Congress, exemplifies all that is best in congressional service. The diligence with which she pursued causes for the benefit of this Nation and her State is spread on the record for all to see. I commend the supporters of this legislation and urge its passage.●

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bills just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

TO CONTINUE TRANSITION PROVISIONS OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT UNTIL MAY 26, 1984

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of House Resolution 490, I call up the Senate bill (S. 2570) to continue the transition provisions of the Bankruptcy Act until May 26, 1984, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 2570

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 402 of the Act entitled "An Act to establish a uniform Law on the Subject of Bankruptcies" (Public Law 95-598) is amended in subsections (b) and (e) by striking out "May 1, 1984" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "May 26, 1984".

(b) Section 404 of such Act is amended in subsections (a) and (b) by striking out "April 30, 1984" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "May 25, 1984".

(c) Section 406 of such Act is amended by striking out "April 30, 1984" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "May 25, 1984".

(d) Section 409 of such Act is amended by—

(1) striking out "May 1, 1984" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "May 26, 1984"; and

(2) striking out "April 30, 1984" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "May 25, 1984".

SEC. 2. The term of office of any bankruptcy judge who was serving on April 30, 1984, and of any bankruptcy judge who is serving on the date of the enactment of this Act is extended to and shall expire on May 25, 1984.

SEC. 3. (a) Section 8339(n) of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking out "April 1, 1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "May 26, 1984".

(b) Section 8331(22) of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking out "April 30, 1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "May 25, 1984".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 490, the gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS).

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of accommodation to the other body, I request favorable consideration of S. 2570 to continue the transition provisions of the bankruptcy law and the terms of office of the judges now sitting on the bankruptcy court until May 25, 1984. This action is taken in response to a request for an extension by the other body, which has not yet been able to act on H.R. 5174, the Bankruptcy Act of 1984, which the House passed on March 21, 1984, to deal with the constitutional problem in the bankruptcy court system. The other body deemed it prudent to extend the transition period until May 25 in the hope that it will be able to either pass the bill, H.R. 5174, or amend it and go to conference before that time.

We have no indication of when the Senate will resolve its internal discussions and take up the bill, but we are hopeful that this extension will be a sufficient period of time to enable the other body to act. If there are sufficient differences when the Senate finally acts, there will need to be time for a conference between the Houses.

I urge passage of this simple extension to prevent the bankruptcy judges' terms of office from expiring which would create a severe dislocation in the system.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California (Mr. EDWARDS) has consumed 1½ minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH).

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 7 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, we have before us today a bill, S. 2570, which would extend the present bankruptcy system from its current expiration date, April 30, until midnight, May 25. It is a delay I had hoped could be avoided when we extended the system last time, on March 30. I reluctantly support adoption of the bill, however, and I do so in the fervent hope that the labor provision which the House tacked onto its bill on March 21, and which has become the cause of the current delay in remedying the bankruptcy courts crisis, can be worked out during this new extension period to the satisfaction of all interested parties.

You will recall that in the House, we have yet to have 1 single day of hearings on the labor provision which we added to H.R. 5174 under a modified, closed rule on March 21. During the nearly 30 days before House consideration, since the Supreme Court issued its decision in NLRB against Bildisco on February 22, the Judiciary Committee had the opportunity to hold hearings, but never did. Since then, the other body has been hard at work doing what the House should have done; namely, working on a compromise to the language in H.R. 5174, negotiating and holding hearings so that all interested parties could be heard.

Part of the function of the Judiciary Committee, as well as all other standing committees of this body, is to inform the House of its recommendation with respect to legislation pending on the floor, and with respect to a House position in conference. Insofar as bankruptcy is concerned, this is a responsibility we have thus far failed to carry out.

Mr. Speaker, what does the record show?

When the other body adopted its bankruptcy courts bill, S. 1013, it did so in combination with a number of other items, including additional district and appellate judgeships. I remind my colleagues that this action took place 1 year ago, on April 28, 1983. In its current consideration of amendments to H.R. 5174, there is every indication that the other body still favors the parts of S. 1013 which differ from H.R. 5174. This is not a secret unknown to our committee leadership. We have every right to expect add-ons by the other body. If I am wrong, I would appreciate being advised now.

It is important to stress that many of the provisions of S. 1013 are of interest to the membership of this House. These include provisions which would better facilitate the assumption of shopping center leases in the event of a shopping center bankruptcy, provisions which would exempt repurchase agreements from the automatic stay under the 1978 code, thereby making them liquid in bankruptcy, and language which would assist elderly creditors who purchase time in real property, only to find that, when the developer of that property goes bankrupt, they become unsecured creditors, often losing their entire investment.

Add to these items the request for additional Federal district and appellate judges, as well as the many substantive differences between the article I bankruptcy court adopted as part of S. 1013, and the article I court passed by the House as part of H.R. 5174, and you can see that there are a number of bankruptcy questions which clearly need to be answered before the Members of this body can intelligently cast their votes.

Mr. Speaker, the Bildisco decision was handed down on February 22. On March 21, the House was called upon to vote on a package of court and substantive amendments. We agreed to an extension on March 30 until April 30. During this entire time, there have been no hearings. Now we are about to agree to a further extension until May 25. During this time, only one hearing on one issue, repurchase agreements, has thus far been scheduled. This is not enough, Mr. Speaker, and I urge that the next 4 weeks be used to advantage by the Judiciary Committee leadership.

This Member, and every Member of this House, has a right to a clear, compelling explanation for the committee's purposeful avoidance of hearings on these issues.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to propound some questions to the majority floor manager. The first question is:

Why has the Committee on the Judiciary chosen not to prepare itself, and through it, the membership of this House, on the many items which each of us knows will likely be contained in the amendment of the other body to H.R. 5174 when it comes back to us toward the end of May?

Mr. GLICKMAN. If the gentleman will yield, I will answer in the following way:

The gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH) has mentioned holding hearings on extraneous issues the other body may add to H.R. 5174 that are not in the bill passed by the House. As was forcefully pointed out by almost every Member from the other side of the aisle who took the microphone on the floor on March 30, we do not know what action the Senate will take. There is certainly not time in the next 30 days to hold the numerous hearings that would be necessary to review all the bankruptcy law, Federal judgeships, and Federal judicial retirement benefits provisions contained in S. 1013.

The gentleman knows that the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. RODINO) has announced further hearings on a variety of issues that need to be addressed on the bankruptcy law. Starting on May 2, with a hearing on repurchase agreements, other issues will be addressed in further hearings designed to educate and inform ourselves on these issues. However, our schedule will not be dictated by the other body, but by the issues.

Mr. FISH. As the gentleman knows, the expiration date of the proposed extension is May 25, on the eve of the Memorial Day break. Does the gentleman plan to adamantly refuse any Senate amendments which differ from H.R. 5174 on the grounds that they have not been adequately considered by the committee and the House, and if he were to take this action, would it not precipitate yet another crisis?

Mr. GLICKMAN. There are certainly many differences between the court provisions that probably will need to be resolved in the conference, and I would say to the gentleman that we do not know yet what the Senate will do with the bill and how it will amend the bill.

The Senate and the House have now passed similar approaches to the bankruptcy court problem, that is true. Both the Senate and the House have an institutional obligation, however, to resolve this constitutional crisis. It would be irresponsible of the Congress if the May 25 deadline for the resolution of the court crisis were not met because it is sidetracked by unrelated bankruptcy and Federal judicial retirement issues that have no deadline.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I could not, of course, disagree with the gentleman more, that 30 days is ample time. In fact, in a letter to the chairman of the committee recently I ventured that no more than 4 days would be required, and I question where the gentleman gets his information that we do not know what is in the Senate bill. We have had it before us for a year. A call to any Senator's staff member or any member of the Senate Judiciary Committee would assure the gentleman that they want the same amendments that differ from ours that the gentleman characterizes as "extraneous."

But I will not go on in colloquy with the gentleman because I feel that I have gotten the reasons on the record as to why we are not going to comply with the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH) has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE).

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I have a little problem with this bill. On February 22, the U.S. Supreme Court came down with a very important decision, a unanimous decision, 9 to 0, called the Bildisco decision, and it has to do with the relative significance—sanctity, if you will, of labor contracts when a company goes bankrupt or seeks a chapter 11 bankruptcy and the status to be given the labor contract in that bankruptcy proceeding, a very important and very controversial issue.

Now, the Democratic leaders of the Judiciary Committee have decided in their wisdom to legislatively reverse that decision, a unanimous decision, of the Court. I ask the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN)—and I know he has got committee counsel Mr. Freeman and Mr. Parker nearby, and also the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTENMEIER), men of great seniority and years—if they can cite one instance in history, the history of this body, when a 9-to-0 Supreme Court decision was to be reversed by legislation without 10 seconds' hearing, without any hearings whatsoever.

I tell the Members that I do not see any bustling or stirring to provide an answer. I will provide the answer. No, it has not been done. This is unique, and I suppose we should take some pleasure in participating in something new and unique in congressional history, that is to say reversing a unanimous Supreme Court decision, an important decision having to do with labor relations, without 10 seconds of hearings.

Now, when we deal with legislation that involves a deliberatial processes, the democratic process, listening to witnesses and listening to people assembled, listening to them in hearings, deliberating and deciding and then adopting or rejecting a law. That whole process has not been eroded by the actions of the Judiciary Committee; it has been assaulted, and destroyed by shoving down the throats of this body—and they persist in doing so—a reversal of unanimous Supreme Court decision without hearings.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN) who is managing this bill and who has answered the previous speaker by saying that hearings are scheduled on repossession, one of the aspects of the bill that he is interested in because he is the chief sponsor, are we going to have any hearings on the reversal of the Bildisco decision.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. I certainly do yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have not talked personally with the chairman of the committee on that particular point. I repeat what I said before, that the chairman intends to have hearings on some bankruptcy related issues, starting with repurchase agreements, but I cannot answer the gentleman's question specifically.

The only thing I can say is that I know the gentleman did not like the provision, but the full House has passed that provision now, and we are in the position of waiting to go to conference with the Senate.

The Senate can pass the bill without that provision in it, and we can go to conference and confer on the merits of it.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, if I may say this to the gentleman, the reversal of the Bildisco decision by legislation was put before this House and we were not permitted to vote on it as an issue because it was put before us in a procedure that did not permit any amendments or a specific vote. That was done on March 21. Now we are extending the time to deal with this issue in a final fashion until May 25.

It seems to me that the importance of the issue, the importance of reversing a Supreme Court decision, calls for hearings in this body, and I ask the gentleman to use his influence with the chairman, who, after all, is noted for being devoted to the Constitution—and I assume that means the deliberative processes of this body are as important to him as they are to me—so that we can have some hearings. And I will rely on the gentleman's assurances that he will bring that up to the chairman of the committee. He can bring it up to the Speaker, too. While you are at it, bring it up to the Speaker, also.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I will be glad to bring it up with the chairman of the committee. I will mention, however, that the Congress did not deal in Bildisco with a constitutional issue. It was an issue of statutory interpretation by the Supreme Court.

Mr. HYDE. I appreciate that, but it was a 9-to-0 decision, and we are reversing it. May I have the gentleman's opinion on this? Does he not think we ought to have hearings on something that significant?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE) has expired.

Mr. HYDE. Saved by the gavel.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS).

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York for yielding this time to me.

In case the gentleman from Kansas would care to use the time, I would yield to him if he would care to respond to the inquiry presented to him by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to do any better job than the gentleman from Illinois did in bringing this issue to my attention, and I would just repeat my responses to the gentleman from Ohio that I indicated to him.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, the admirable gentleman from Kansas has given an admirable answer, and we appreciate his filling in. He is in difficult circumstances, when the chairman of the committee is missing, along with a few other people. But he is holding up very well on his own over there.

Mr. Speaker, I say to my colleagues that I would like to just take a moment to again reemphasize the need to look at what we are doing here today and look at it in the light of what we are going to be doing here 24 or 25 days from now. We are going to be doing it again. We are going to be presented, almost assuredly, with another request of having an extension of time for the bankruptcy courts and procedure to be extended under the existing temporary setup.

Why are we going to be presented with such an additional request for delay? We are going to be presented with that request to extend the time again because there are other, not directly related matters, that are in controversy that have not been settled over on the other side of Capitol Hill, and indeed when we get into it with representations from this side of Capitol Hill, it will be worse. It will not be any better; it will be worse.

We have heard some comments here today about the language in the bill as passed by the House that would reverse the Bildisco decision of the Supreme Court of February 22. That was very quick action to attempt to reverse that Supreme Court decision, a unanimous Supreme Court decision. But they are not having much success over on the other side of the Hill in dealing with that issue. The only way they can deal with that issue that quickly is by not allowing anyone to vote on it, like we did over here on this side.

We know how to deal with those issues. Let us not allow anyone to vote, and then we can deal with it quickly.

But as long as there is any vestige of a democratic function and democratic process involved it is not going to be settled all that easily. We are not going to reverse a Supreme Court decision of that importance all that readily. So we are going to have a request for another extension of time within 20 days or so, and at that point in time that what we ought to do is deal with the bankruptcy courts and bankruptcy procedure matters and separate them out from these other issues. That is the way it ought to be done. There is no reason for them to be tied together.

31-059 O-87-6 (Pt. 8)

Those other issues do not have time limits on them. We can deal with the bankruptcy courts and the procedure problem. We could do it today if it were in order to simply add to this temporary extension bill an amendment that says the exact same thing we said in title I of the House-passed bill about the courts and procedural matters. We could send that over to the other body, and the other body would have an opportunity to separate that from all these other things.

Well, we do not have the posture in which to do that today, but the next time another extension is requested, that is going to be the time for us to mount our efforts in getting these issues separated.

□ 1320

They are asking for more time over on the other side of the Hill to deal with the Bildisco or labor contract language, I guess. We ought to go along with that I think on this occasion, this day, but that is all, not one more time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Ohio, if he would yield.

Mr. KINDNESS. I yield.

Mr. GLICKMAN. I just say to the gentleman that I agree that this is a matter of very great seriousness. I would hope that we would not need another extension in 3 or 4 weeks, whenever we are back here, because to bankruptcy judges, to debtors, to creditors all over this Nation, as well as to people interested in the substantive changes that were made, these are very important issues.

I will just again make the point that regardless of whether you like the bill or not that we passed before, we have passed the legislation. Right now it is in the Senate's lap. They have the opportunity of passing a bankruptcy bill shortly, if they so choose, and I think that this discussion today might prompt them to do that. If they are able to do that in the next week or two, we will be able to confer and get a full bill by May 25, and that would be my hope and I am sure it is the gentleman's hope as well.

Mr. KINDNESS. I would join the gentleman in that wish, that hope, and I certainly would do anything that we could do on our side to bring about that result; but right now the House and the Senate are not in disagreement technically and there is not anything we can do from this side. We are sort of waiting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I was very interested in the colloquy the gentleman just had with the majority manager of this bill in terms of the conference. Would the gentleman not agree with me that if we are going to go to conference with the Senate, and the Senate has given every indication what it wants to have as part of this bill, that we should inform ourselves as a committee on the issues involved prior to the conference. There is bound to be a very short time between their action and the termination of this extension period.

Would the gentleman not agree with me that it would be wise if we knew the merits of some of the additions to the House-passed version that we would be likely to be considering in conference?

Mr. KINDNESS. Well, the gentleman is quite correct and I would go a step beyond that and suggest that it would seem to me to be quite prudent for the whole committee, the total Judiciary Committee to be a part of that hearing process on these other issues.

The time is not really sufficient to confine that hearing process to the subcommittee's membership, when the need for exposure to the ideas is greater. Why not have the hearings, in a somewhat unusual step, before the full committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman.

Mr. KINDNESS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I recall in our time on the Judiciary Committee we have always taken a great deal of pride in the scrutiny that we give to requests by the judicial conference for additional district court and circuit judges. We have certain standards by which we judge these requests.

It is very clear, as the gentleman knows, that the Senate, a year ago and since, has given every indication that it expects to ask for additional judgeships. It may be a number which is at variance with what our committee standards would recommend.

Would the gentleman not agree with me that since we have known about this for such a long time and now we have almost 4 additional weeks as a result of this extension period, we should be putting the probable request under the scrutiny and under the usual process of our committee to see what judgeships truly are needed at this time?

Mr. KINDNESS. I would thoroughly agree. It is a wonderful opportunity that is not being utilized at present that could have been utilized before this time and certainly ought to be used during this interim period to apply those standards.

Those judgeship figures, of course, are based on 1980 caseloads, so we are not dealing with anything that is brand new and hot off the press. It can be considered in this period of time beautifully.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. LUNGREN).

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, it appears that we are going to have to have an extension because of the situation in which we find ourselves, but as many speakers have said, it is unfortunate we are here. If we extend this for another 25 days we will find ourselves just a month short of 2 years since the Supreme Court declared the 1978 reform of the bankruptcy courts unconstitutional.

Now, it is true that the House of Representatives is not always noted for moving swiftly, but this must be considered glacier-like speed, if anything, that has come before the House.

This is a constitutional crisis only because we have allowed it to become a constitutional crisis. The Supreme Court declared the process that we had developed in 1978 to be unconstitutional, but granted us an extension. This will be the fourth judicial and congressional extension, and it seems to me it ill serves this body to have serious matters like this dealt with in so cavalier a fashion.

The real sticking point in all this, of course, is what some of us would refer to as the extraneous matter that has been applied to the court system and that is the whole question of the Bildisco case. I happen to be one of those, as I think most Members are, who believe that we ought to visit the Bildisco case. There is certainly something that ought to be done with respect to a unilateral abrogation of a collective bargaining agreement upon the very entry into chapter 11. It seems to me we could certainly accommodate that by requiring a judicial determination within a reasonable period of time; but the first part of the Bildisco decision also is subject to change by the bill we passed out of the House. That is the standard to be applied by the courts when they make a determination as to whether abrogation is appropriate. This standard was the first part of the decision by the Supreme Court and it was affirmed by a 9-to-0 vote. Justice Brennan and Justice Thurgood Marshall were part of that 9-to-0 vote.

The swiftness with which we move to try and overturn that decision ought to cause us some pause and some concern. It appears that it is that pause that the Senate is attempting to make by at least holding hearings on the Bildisco decision, now requiring this 30-day extension.

It is unfortunate that during the period of time since we passed this bill, we have not had hearings in the House. It seems to me that we ought to do that. The House at the present time does not seem to be overwhelmed with legislative activity. We are going to leave today about 2:30 to come back next week for a short work term again, and although as I have said on the floor, I do not believe that Members of Congress are overpaid, if this continues much longer the consensus of the country may very well be that we are overpaid, based on the lack of work that is going forward here.

So I would hope that we would look very, very seriously during the 25-day period as to what it is we did on the Supreme Court decision dealing with abrogation of collective bargaining agreements when a company attempts to go through chapter 11.

The important point that seems to be missed in all this is that chapter 11 is a process which we developed to allow companies to reorganize themselves under current management so that they do not have to go belly up. In essence it seems to me that the underlying foundation of all that is the protection of the jobs that exist in those companies as they attempt to reorganize.

If what we want to do is throw out chapter 11 and only allow companies to go belly up and then go through the full bankruptcy, we ought to say that up front, but that consideration has not even been made in any hearings that we have had on this legislation.

I would hope that we would consider it within the next 30 days, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I have one more request for time. I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GEKAS).

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman has yielded me this time.

This is not the first time in my brief congressional career in which I come to a point where I am still anguished before casting a vote as to which way to finally go. The squeeze play is on. My heart tells me that I should vote "no" on this measure as a protest, saying it is another delay, another postponement of that time when we must deal with these vital issues. I know that bankruptcy is not a very romantic issue and one which is not likely to spring everybody into great emotional action, but it is important right at a point when our economy needs a stabilization of all our economic machinery, and bankruptcy is one of them; so I want to vote no as a protest and say we have got to deal with this. It is no longer possible to keep on postponing this type of issue, but in my heart I also know, and my mind tells me, what is left of it, that we must vote yes because we cannot leave the country without a bankruptcy machinery as of May 1.

I still have not made up my mind. Somebody is going to have to deal with my heart and my mind in the remaining time left before this vote is cast.

But, as I stand here, I am hoping against hope that this will be the last time that we will be deciding on whether to delay a final decision.

With that in mind and in heart, I will let the scoreboard reveal later which way I have decided.

I thank the gentleman for yielding and yield back my time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time, and I would ask the Chair how much that amounts to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH) has 7 minutes remaining.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I would just like to make the following points; that is, that on April 12 the other body passed this bill and as a favor to Senator BAKER asked the chairman of the committee to have this bill pass under a unanimous-consent request.

That unanimous-consent request was brought up and it was objected to I believe by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) on the Republican side. Therefore, I would point out to the House that whereas that bill could have been passed that day extending it to May 25, could have been driven 1 mile downtown and been signed by the President, this bill, if passed today, will have to be flown 8,000 miles to Shanghai to be signed at a tremendous cost to the taxpayers of the United States. Probably, Mr. Chairman, this is the first bill in the history of this House that has ever been literally shanghaied on its way to passage.

I would say, however, that this is a very serious issue and I would like to echo what the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. KINDNESS) said, that millions of people are affected by the viability of our bankruptcy courts.

We passed a bill which provided for the appropriate constitutional dealings with bankruptcy as well as several substantive issues. That bill has gone to the other body. We have good faith and hope and reason to believe that the other body will act and pass a comparable measure which can then go to conference and can be resolved before the Memorial Day break so that the millions of creditors and debtors and consumer finance people and farmers and everybody else who has an interest in the proper operation of the bankruptcy courts can rest assured that this issue will be taken care of.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I will be glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. WALKER. I was on the telephone, but the gentleman evidently used my name as the person who stopped the unanimous-consent procedure.

Does the gentleman think that this is the kind of thing that we ought to run around doing by unanimous consent in this body on bills that have absolutely no hearings, that we have no ability to know precisely what is in them? As a matter of fact, it was described when I was reserving my right to object the other day, and I was told that this was not even a bill. The Chair told me we did not even have a piece of legislation before us. There was not even an understanding of what it was we were dealing with.

Does the gentleman think that we ought to proceed by unanimous consent under such circumstances?

Mr. GLICKMAN. The gentleman understood that bill on April 12 to be an extension of time to May 25, or the exact same bill we are taking up today. That was my understanding.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman from Kansas may have had an understanding. The Chair obviously did not. The Chair on that day, and the gentleman can check the record, described it as not even being a piece of legislation.

So there was an awful lot of confusion around here as to what it was we were dealing with. I simply suggest to the gentleman that it is very bad procedure to deal with matters of a complicated nature under unanimous consent.

And there was certainly no agreement on our side that it ought to be done by unanimous consent. This gentleman thinks that dealing with it in an open debate such as this, where we have a chance to air the issues, is a much better way of proceeding than the unanimous consent that evidently the gentleman would have had us use.

Mr. GLICKMAN. My only point was the bill we were dealing with was an extension of time and I think the Republican members of the Judiciary Committee knew of it at the time. Again my point is I was not here at that time so I acknowledge that, but we are required now to send a bill 8,000 miles to China to be signed where the bill could have been signed very quickly that day.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman would yield further, if we had acted on it 13 months ago when the Judiciary Committee reported it out, or at least had brought it up under the Calendar Wednesday that the chairman could have used on several occasions this year, we would not have come to this crisis where we even come into the China trip.

Mr. GLICKMAN. That may have been true and I may have been one of the parties trying to get it to the floor faster than it was. But now we have to deal with the realities of the situation and the realities are, unfortunately, we have another extension. Hopefully the issue will be resolved before a further extension is needed.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO COMMIT OFFERED BY MR. SENSENBRENNER

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to commit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. In its present form, I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to commit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SENSENBRENNER moves to commit S. 2570 to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report the bill back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: On page 1, line 7, strike "May 26" and insert in lieu thereof "May 24".

On page 1, line 10, strike "May 25" and insert in lieu thereof "May 23".

On page 2, line 3, strike "May 25" and insert in lieu thereof "May 23".

On page 2, line 6, strike "May 26" and insert in lieu thereof "May 24".

On page 2, line 9, strike "May 25" and insert in lieu thereof "May 23".

On page 2, line 13, strike "May 25" and insert in lieu thereof "May 23".

On page 2, line 16, strike "May 26" and insert in lieu thereof "May 24".

On page 2, line 19, strike "May 25" and insert in lieu thereof "May 23".

Mr. SENSENBRENNER (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion to commit be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. SENSENBRENNER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, this is a rather simple and straightforward motion to commit, merely to move forward the deadline date from midnight Friday, May 25, to midnight Wednesday, May 23.

Mr. Speaker, we are asking for trouble if we have this bill with this history of legislative chicken on the subject of bankruptcy expiring on midnight May 25, which is at the time when the House and the other body are scheduled to go out for their Memorial Day recess. I believe that passing the bill with a Friday, May 25, deadline is a guarantee that the Members will have to change their plans and will not be able to get out of Washington to their respective districts until the deadline has expired.

Merely by moving the date forward 2 days will guarantee that this issue will come to a head and will be resolved on Wednesday, May 23, consequently, not inconveniencing any of the Members and forcing schedules and plane reservations to be rewritten.

I would anticipate that the only argument that could be made against this motion to commit is that it would require the concurrence of the other body and the amendment that is proposed, thus proposing an opportunity that the bill would miss the fast plane to Shanghai. I think that this amendment has so much merit that the other body, when it stops to think about it, would quickly concur in the amendment by unanimous consent and the plane would take off.

Consequently, I would hope that this would be an agreeable motion to commit so that we can get this matter wrapped up on a Wednesday rather than on a Friday. I certainly do not think that it is going to delay the resolution of these bankruptcy problems unduly and it certainly would prevent a substantial inconvenience from occurring to the Members of this body and the other body with respect to the previously announced Memorial Day recess.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this motion to commit.

In the first place, the bill we are dealing with today is the exact bill the other body has passed and sent over here. We are doing this extension as an accommodation to the other body.

In addition, the bill has to be signed tonight by the Speaker pro tem and there is a plane waiting to take off tomorrow morning to go to China to get this bill signed by the President. There is an additional time delay, because they have to cross the international dateline and will lose another day. We are in a situation where we could face a lapse of the court's jurisdiction and expiration of the judges' terms.

I am sure that the President and the Justice Department and the administration are not in favor of this motion to commit.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. LOTT).

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reluctantly rise in opposition to this motion also. I know that the intent is well intentioned in what the gentleman is trying to do here.

We do quite often get up against these deadlines. We are now scheduled to go out May 24 at the close of business, so we are talking about really just 1 day's difference.

But what worries me is the fact that this has to go back to the other body. They have to get it up. They might try to ask unanimous consent and that very likely would be objected to, or they will have to vote on it again. This will become badminton and we will be hitting this birdie back and forth even further.

The gentleman from Kansas makes a legitimate point. We need to get this finished today and get it out to the President for his signature because we do have this deadline that we are facing on Monday and it takes a lot of time and difficulty getting it to the President at this particular moment.

So I have to question the positive effects of what the gentleman is trying to do here. I would urge my colleagues not to support this motion to commit.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I too must reluctantly rise in opposition to this for the reasons stated by the minority whip. I think we are running a risk of fouling up something that is of no doing on our part and as the gentleman pointed out, it is important that we handle this matter with dispatch.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to commit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to commit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SENSENBRENNER) there were—yeas 9, nays 17.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5 of rule XV, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the question of passage. Members will record their votes by electronic device.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. LOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time for the purpose of receiving the legislative schedule for the balance of the week and for next week, and I am pleased to yield to the distinguished majority whip for advising the Members of our schedule.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, the House will consider next the rule on the National Bureau of Standards Act and complete consideration of that bill, and that will conclude the business for the day.

The House will not meet tomorrow. It will be my intention to ask permission to go over until Monday next, at which time the House will consider under suspension 19 bills. Those bills are as follows:

H.R. 5188, authorizations for International Trade Commission, Customs Service, and U.S. Trade Representative;

□ 1410

The House will meet at noon on Tuesday and consider the Private Calendar, and suspensions under the suspension of the rules are as follows:

H.R. 4666, provide for recovery by the United States of costs of hospital and medical care in certain circumstances;

H.R. 5041, Joint Research and Development Act;

H. Con. Res. 275, commending Colombian Government for recent cocaine seizures and for other purposes;

Following debates on those suspensions, we shall resume consideration of H.R. 7, the Child Nutrition Act, and complete its consideration.

I would like to advise the House that all votes on suspensions on both Monday and Tuesday will be postponed until the end of business on Tuesday. There will be no votes on suspensions on Monday and no votes on any suspensions on that day or Tuesday until the end of business on Tuesday, May 1.

On Wednesday and the balance of the week, May 2, 3, and 4, the House will meet at 3 p.m. on Wednesday, and 11 a.m. the balance of the week, considering the conference report on S. 64, the Irish Wilderness Act; the conference report on S. 1129, the Domestic Volunteer Service Act Amendments, and H.R. 4275, Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act, open rule, 1 hour of debate.

The House will adjourn by 3 p.m. on Friday. Conference reports, of course, may be brought up at any time, and any further program may be announced later. It is my thought that it is probable that the House will not meet Friday if we can complete this program, but we cannot give total assurance of that at this time.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman for providing us with this lengthy and significant list of legislation that will be considered next week, and the gentleman has answered the one question this gentleman had, as to whether or not we would be in session on Friday. It is not anticipated that we would be in session on Friday of next week, is that correct?

Mr. FOLEY. It is not presently anticipated if we can complete the program as announced.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5172, NATIONAL BUREAU OF STANDARDS AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEARS 1984 AND 1985

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 481 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 481

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5172) to authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Commerce for the programs of the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 and for related purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. All points of order against the consideration of the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of sections 311(a), 401(b)(1) and 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) are hereby waived, and all points of order against the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5(a), rule XXI are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority members of the Committee on Science and Technology, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule by titles instead of by sections, and each title shall be considered as having been read. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California (Mr. BEILENSON) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. QUILLEN) for purposes of debate only, pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 481 provides for the consideration of H.R. 5172, the National Bureau of Standards authorization for fiscal years 1984 and 1985. The rule provides for 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Science and Technology. It is an open rule, allowing any germane amendment to be offered under the 5-minute rule. The resolution also provides that the bill shall be read for amendment by titles rather than by sections, with each title to be considered as having been read. House Resolution 481 also provides one motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that the rule waives a number of points of order so that the bill may be considered. The rule waives, first of all, sections 311(a) and 401(b)(1) of the Congressional Budget Act.

Section 311(a) of the budget act prohibits consideration of any measure providing new entitlement authority for a fiscal year if enactment of that measure would breach or further breach the spending ceiling for that fiscal year. The spending ceiling for fiscal year 1984 has been breached already. So, any additional spending for fiscal year 1984 will further breach the ceiling and is subject to a point of order under this section.

Section 306 of the National Bureau of Standards Authorization Act, which would be considered under this resolution, raises the salary of the Director of the Bureau to level IV on the executive schedule. The raise is effective immediately. Hence, the bill, as reported, provides new entitlement authority in fiscal year 1984. Consequently, the bill, as reported, would be subject to a point of order under section 311(a) of the Budget Act.

Section 401(b)(1) of the budget act prohibits consideration of any measure providing new entitlement authority which is effective before the start of the fiscal year beginning in the calendar year in which the bill is reported. The bill was reported in calendar year 1984 and the new entitlement authority would be effective before the start of fiscal year 1985. Consequently, the bill, as reported, would violate section 401(b)(1) of the Budget Act.

The Rules Committee understands that the Committee on Science and Technology will offer a floor amendment limiting the raise in salary to amounts provided in advance in appropriation acts. In that case, the bill would not provide new entitlement authority and the bill, as amended, would not violate sections 311(a) or 401(b)(1) of the Budget Act. Because the committee amendment would cure these violations, the rule waives the points of order and permits consideration of the bill.

In addition, House Resolution 481 waives section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act. Section 402(a) of the Budget Act prohibits consideration of any measure making authorizations for a fiscal year if the measure was not reported by May 15 of the preceding year. H.R. 5172 contains various authorizations for fiscal years 1984; however, it was not reported by May 15, 1983. The purpose of the May 15 deadline is to insure that authorizations are adopted in time for the House to consider the relevant appropriations. The Committee on Science and Technology reported out H.R. 2513, providing authorizations for fiscal year 1984 for the National Bureau of Standards, by May 15, 1983. The House, however, did not consider H.R. 2513 last year. However, fiscal year 1984 appropriations were enacted in Public Law 98-166. The fiscal year 1984 authorization levels in H.R. 5172 reflect the fiscal year 1984 appropriations already enacted into law. Because the Committee on Science and Technology reported out fiscal year 1984 authorizations by the deadline and because the purposes of section 402(a) have been met, the rule waives section 402(a).

In addition, the rule waives clause 5(a) of rule XXI. Clause 5(a) prohibits appropriations in a legislative bill. Section 301(a) of H.R. 5172 expands the purposes for which fees for calibration and other services may be used. Section 301(a) permits the working capital fund to be used to replace equipment and inventories. The purposes for which the fund may be used have already been authorized. H.R. 5172 does not provide for any additional fees to be collected. For these reasons, the rule waives clause 5(a) of rule XXI.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5172 authorizes $115.7 million in fiscal year 1984 and $132.8 million in fiscal year 1985. The bill authorizes important programs to improve our Nation's research and development capabilities. Two of the programs authorized include the center for building research and the Fire Research Center. These programs were eliminated in the President's 1984 budget proposal. In order to maintain these important programs, the committee recommends an increase of $6.7 million over the President's proposal for the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal year 1985.

In addition, $4.1 million is authorized for the Office of Productivity, Technology, and Innovation. That office develops policies and cooperative activities between Government and industry to enhance technological innovation and industrial productivity. These programs are crucial to our Nation's technological advancement.

I urge my colleagues to begin consideration of the bill by adopting the rule before us.

□ 1420

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes appropriations for the National Bureau of Standards. It is $8 million over the President's budget. I know there will be some amendments offered on the floor and the bill will be amply debated.

I know of no objection to the rule, and I urge the adoption of the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time either, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 282, nays 47, not voting 104, as follows:

Mr. NIELSON of Utah and Mr. BEREUTER changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous material on the bill, H.R. 5172.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL BUREAU OF STANDARDS AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEARS 1984 AND 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 481 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 5172.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5172) to authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Commerce for the programs of the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 and for related purposes, with Mr. RICHARDSON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. GREGG) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA).

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the bill, H.R. 5172, provides for authorization of the National Bureau of Standards and several smaller related activities. The bill has been the subject of 4 days of hearings in our committee and was reported by the full committee on April 4. It would authorize some $132.8 million for the Bureau of Standards and an additional $5.2 million for the Office of Productivity, Technology, and Information, for the fiscal year 1985.

The bill is divided into three titles, Mr. Chairman. For fiscal year 1984, our committee last year reported out the bill, H.R. 2513, and that bill was not considered by the House. We have therefore included it as title I of the current bill before us. Title I is identical to H.R. 2513, with one significant exception. The amounts that would be authorized have been reduced slightly to conform with the fiscal amounts provided for in the appropriation acts and also in Public Law 98-166.

We have included title I to provide continuity of authorization for the National Bureau of Standards.

Title II contains the authorization for the Bureau of Standards and several related activities for fiscal year 1985.

The total included in the bill is $138 million, which compares to the President's request of $130 million, and with the appropriation level for the previous fiscal year of $120 million.

Our committee arrived at the recommended level for these activities after considerable hearings and careful consideration of the priorities reflected in the President's budget. Most significant was the administration's recommendation to target two small but important programs, the fire research and the building research programs. Both of these programs had been targeted for termination last year as well. In both instances they were restored by the Congress for the fiscal year 1984.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee that handled the hearings on this bill and brought it to the full committee and now for consideration on the House floor, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALGREN).

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Chairman, I want to salute the consideration that the chairman of the full Science and Technology Committee has brought to this bill, authorizing the National Bureau of Standards, and the interest that the other members of the subcommittee and the full committee have given to considering the program of the National Bureau of Standards.

This is a relatively small program as its use given the attention of the House of Representatives go, and yet because the Bureau of Standards focuses on the need for sophisticated scientific measurement, this program is critical as a facilitator of much of the economic activity in our country. The Bureau of Standards has the responsibility of assuring us that our measurement capabilities are equal to the demands that exploding technology is making on commerce. It provides a critical service to the American economy.

There are many ways that you can distribute the emphasis we put on programs of the Bureau of Standards. The minority and the majority see eye to eye on some of the most important ones. Although we weigh the requests of the administration a little differently, by and large we are very close in terms of dollars in the overall.

The most important thing is the agreement between the minority and the majority about the importance of maintaining both the Center for Fire Research and the Center for Building Research Technology. Both of these are relatively small efforts, somewhere in the range of $5 million or thereabouts. Both of which were zeroed out by the administration; but I think both sides of the aisle are doing the right thing in supporting their maintenance at the present levels of effort.

Clearly, the contribution of the Center for Fire Research is one which we ought to support out of respect for the lives and safety issues involved. That center has made substantial contributions to a host of fire-related breakthroughs, both in protection for firefighters themselves and also in the development of low-pressure sprinkler systems that are now seen as the real hope for residential fire protection where most of the lives are lost.

The same thing can be said of the Center for Building Technology, an area where the development of standards for buildings and their characteristics is most important for our economy.

The testimony by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States was that one effort alone of the Center for Building Technology, an effort to standardize the requirement for insulation that had been made by the Federal Trade Commission, saved the construction industry literally $90 million in one item alone. The savings from that one action, if simply put in the bank, would provide the ongoing revenue to fund this level of effort forever.

□ 1450

All recognize the Center for Building Technology as a very cost effective effort, one recognized on both the minority and majority sides of the aisle. We want to salute the minority for recognizing the importance of this program, even though the administration did not.

We do differ in how we cut the cloth in some of the other programs. With respect to biotechnology, the administration recommended a $3 million effort. The committee bill preserves that $3 million effort in new measurement techniques for the emerging biotechnology industry.

Measurement is the key to commerce. If we are unable to measure the quantity or quality of microorganisms, it will be difficult to sell them. The administration recognized the importance of this in recommending the biotechnology measurement effort in the bill.

In order to make room for the fire and building technology efforts, the minority provides no funds for biotechnology. I would argue that, inasmuch as the administration recognized this as an area of important present investment that can only be made by Government, we ought to maintain that manpower in the bill.

Similar arguments would lie for the initiatives recommended by the administration in the area of manufacturing process and quality control. Again, measurements efforts that are the key to great increases in productivity, especially considering the role of automation in industry. And again, only Government has the incentive to do the measurement research that lies at the heart of these kinds of processes.

The same is true for the effort, also supported by the administration, of cold neutron beam measurements which are aimed at further understanding of the surface characteristics of materials. Surface characteristics are critical to advanced treatment of materials, such as the layering of one alloy over another or treating the surface of materials to change their performance. There have been applications in that area in jet turbines where before we had to use very heavy materials simply to get the surface behavior. Now we are able to use lighter materials and alloy or overlay on top of that the surface materials that we need.

As I understand it, the cold neutron beam research will enable us to go farther in the area of understanding the surface characteristics of materials and be a very good investment. The administration recognized that. The administration urged that investment. The committee maintains it.

It is true that reasonable people can differ on the priority of these programs. All are relatively small. All are in the $1 million to $5 million range.

But it is also true that, once we preserve the fire and the building technology work, it is hard not to substantially reduce the other programs which were judged to how high priority by the administration. If cuts are to be made to heed the overall level within the total recommended by the administration, it is hard not to reduce these other efforts in our view, below the necessary critical mass, because the dollar amounts we are talking about are literally so small.

So I would urge people to understand that, once you support importance of the fire effort and the building research effort and recognize the strength of the administration's arguments for the other initiatives, the bill will come out at the level that the committee has reported. There is simply not very much room to reduce those programs without cutting them to the point where the proper question would be: Should they exist at all?

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

The chairman of the full committee and the chairman of the subcommittee have made an excellent presentation of where we lie with this bill. It is not a bill which involves a significant amount of money relative to the oversight budget of this country. But it is a bill which significantly impacts the commerce of the country and therefore is one which we must take very seriously and address, I believe, in specifics and in light of where the commerce of this country is going to go.

The request by the Bureau prior to this bill being put forward was 8.6 percent above the appropriated level for 1984. In other words, the President's request representated an 8.6 percent increase. This bill, however, represents a 14-percent increase in 1 year. The request of this bill is $6.7 million above the Bureau's request, and, yes, there is no question but that the additional $6.7 million makes sense in many areas, if we did not have a $200 billion deficit.

It is another situation much like the NSF budget which we dealt with yesterday where you have an agency which is doing good work, which can do more good work, but which has received significant increases to reflect the good work it has done, which has been rewarded by the administration for this good work by the significant increases in funding. And yet the committee has decided to even go further and add increases upon increases.

So what we are talking about again today is what level of increase are we going to have for this agency. Are we going to have a level of increase which is 8.6 percent over last year's appropriated level or are we going to have a level 14 percent over last year's appropriated level? And in a combined basis I think you are talking about 22 percent and somewhere in the vicinity of 28 or 29 percent, and maybe it is 26 and 33 percent over 2 years.

So this agency has done well and this bill is a significant increase. But it is an increase which in my opinion is inappropriate because the administration increase was also significant and yet took into account the deficit situation.

The bill itself addresses a number of new initiatives, new initiatives which again the agency should be and can undertake. However, they are initiatives which in this time of fiscal restraint I believe the agency cannot afford to undertake.

The fact, a number of these initiatives sort of have the proverbial camel's nose under the tent syndrome to them. The initiatives proposed in the area of supercomputers presented about $4.3 million and I believe has an out-year cost of up to $5 million in addition. The cold neutron proposal, which I happen to think is a new one and a new initiative, has $1.5 million for this year but could be $30 million before it is finished. The biotechnology area, the limits on biotechnology are totally without perspective at this time but it is clear that we are going to be spending a lot more money in that area if we start this new initiative this year.

In light of the fact that the administration, while increasing the funding for NBS by 8.6 percent, and the bill and the proposal by 8.6 percent zeroed out the fire research and the building research areas. In light of that I think it is fairly clear that these new initiatives which have been proposed and supported by the administration are going to cost a great deal of money, not only this year but in the outyears relative to the entire budget of NBS and will continue to put, as a result of that additional cost, strain on the underlying functions of NBS which have been and have been strongly supported in the area of fire research and building research where they have done such a good job, and for my opinion I also think we should come from strength.

This is an agency whose strength has been in the fire research and building research and we should continue those programs and continue to fund them at adequate levels before we go on to new initiatives, especially at a time of fiscal restraint.

The Bureau is an agency which has an excellent track record, there is no question about it. But it is also an agency which, like every other agency in this Government, must be looked at in the perspective of the entire spending in the Government.

And here we are asking for an 8.6-percent increase by the administration and yet the committee asks for an additional 6 percent on top of that.

I really do not think that if we do not have the strength and capacity in this Congress to bring a budget which is so relatively small, for the Bureau of Standards, which is an $125 to $130 million budget, down to the levels which were requested by the administration, I would say that we probably are not going to be able to reduce this Federal budget at any point. It is just very hard for me to believe that we can sit here and argue that we are concerned about the deficits when we are dealing with an agency that has received a proposed 8.6-percent increase and we decide to put another 6 percent on top of that and the numbers are so small that we do not have the courage to even stand up to that additional 6 percent and just allow an 8.6-percent increase.

The time has come, I think, as small as this agency's budget may be, the time has come for us to stand and say that we are going to have to judge each agency in relationship not only to its own qualities but in relationship to the deficit.

Here is a good chance to do it, because you can vote for a significant increase in spending for this agency and still say that you are being fiscally responsible.

So I will be offering an amendment to bring this budget in line with an 8.6-percent increase versus a 14-percent increase.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN).

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I regret, again, taking the time of the Members to go over some of the aspects of this bill, most of which have been very well treated by the chairman of the full committee and the chairman and ranking member of the subcommittee.

I think we all understand the nature of the bill, the value of the programs that are involved here, and I think we also understand that we are going to hear some of the same arguments that were made yesterday in connection with the National Science Foundation bill with regard to reductions in this bill.

Now, I will agree with the distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire who has made the point that the administration has given a relatively good budget to this agency, the National Bureau of Standards.

I complimented the administration yesterday for their recommendations in connection with the National Science Foundation and I will do the same today with regard to the Bureau of Standards.

But I would ask us all to look at the situation that is involved here and see if we cannot make discriminating judgments on some basis other than simply saying that this is not in accordance with the President's request.

We know it is not in accordance with the President's request. We are not going to adopt a budget that is in accordance with the President's request. So let us look at the details here and see what we want to do about it.

It has been pointed out that two of the additions have to do with the building safety and the fire programs.

We are involved here in that delicate interface between the role of the Federal Government and the role of the private sector.

This administration, in looking at that interface, has made some judgments that they either will or will not continue to fund programs. In this case they decided they did not want to continue funding them. They made a mistake, that is all.

They almost made that same decision with regard to funding aerospace research, for example, and after they went into an extended study of the importance of federally supported aerospace research, they decided to continue with that.

If these programs were not so small that they have not even made such a study, they would recommend that these be continued, because the insurance industry is not going to fund this kind of research and the building industry is not going to fund this kind of research. They both testified to that effect.

They have asked the Bureau to continue with it and there is no doubt of the value of it. If you saw some of the television coverage on the earthquake in California this last week, for example, you would have noted that the question was asked: Why is it that a 6.2 Richter scale earthquake did no more damage than it did? And the answer was given that it is because we have improved building and structural standards to the point that the newly constructed buildings can resist that size earthquake, where they would have been destroyed 25 years ago.

That research is done in the Bureau of Standards and it would not be done anywhere else.

A similar situation exists with regard to the Institute for Computer Science and Technology. Obviously, we have another interface with a huge private industry. Who is going to do the research? Well, I will tell you that private industry is not going to do the kind of standards research that the Bureau is doing. Yesterday's Post had a major article headlined, "Pact Signed for Standards on Computers."

The Secretary of Commerce and the head of the NBS were there along with representatives of a number of private firms. One of those was a vice president of General Motors, a former administrator of NASA, Bob Frosch, who many of us know.

Frosch said that improving existing computer equipment could double productivity in some GM departments and new, completely compatible equipment could increase productivity fourfold.

It was to obtain that kind of compatibility that he signed a contract to establish these interface standards with the Bureau of Standards.

And that is what private industry wants the Bureau to do. Yet the administration, the OMB, is suggesting that we cut funding for this Institute in half. That is ridiculous. That would eliminate a program which holds the potential for multiplying the productivity of American industry many times over.

Now you are going to have before you probably this year or next a lot of proposals to vastly expand the Federal Government's role in improving productivity in this country. We have had them before.

The fact is that the programs we have in existence now, in the National Bureau of Standards, are the best thing we can be doing for American industry. We have had the NBS for generations. It is accepted by industry, it is making a tremendous contribution, and for us to come in willy-nilly and cut the most sensitive parts of it, the most valuable parts of it, the parts that are doing the most to equip our economy for this new age that we are emerging into; is just not good sense.

And yet that little Institute, funded at $10 million over in NBS, gets kicked around from pillar to post. Last year they were going to take it completely out and put it over in the General Services Administration, which knows very little about computer standards. This year they are keeping it in NBS, but they are just cutting its budget in half.

We want to put the money back. It will pay for itself 10 times over.

So I urge Members to accept the figures that are in the committee bill. They have been carefully worked out and apply a standard of commonsense and concern for the welfare of this country, not a blind adherence to some set of numbers that you know and I know came from some bureaucrat over at OMB who did not spend half the time that the committee has in looking at this.

● Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to rise in support of H.R. 5172, and to congratulate my friend, Mr. WALGREN, chairman of the subcommittee, Chairman FUQUA, and ranking minority member, Mr. WINN, for their excellent work in creating this bill, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

In particular I would like to address one component of the bill which has been sponsored by myself and the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. SKEEN), the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, has resulted from the work of my Subcommitteee on Investigations and Oversight.

All of us have read about failures of buildings and bridges throughout the United States that resulted from failures in their structural design. Examples such as the collapse of a walkway at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Kansas City, or the failure of a bridge along Interstate 95 in Connecticut are well known. Moreover, in many of our districts we know of some building or bridge that collapsed long before it should have.

In its investigation of these structural failures, the subcommittee did not seek to assess blame in any particular case but rather sought to identify generic causes and factors responsible for these failures. The most alarming of the findings is that there is no mechanism for learning from our past mistakes. Results from the investigation of a failure usually just end up in the files of a law firm or insurance company, or are sealed from the public altogether in the litigation settlements.

Without some public access and a central repository for this data, the professionals involved in architecture, engineering, and construction do not have easily accessible technical data on the causes of the collapse and they cannot use the data to avoid making similar mistakes. Section 307 of this bill charges the Bureau of Standards with maintaining this repository, an idea which has been widely endorsed by the professional community.

Section 307 also gives the Bureau the statutory authority to conduct investigations of major structural failures. This is not new; it merely gives the Bureau statutory authority to execute a function it has been carrying out for 15 years already. The Bureau has made a number of investigations of major failures throughout the country, which have been enormously helpful in preventing their repetition.

Section 307 does not give Bureau regulatory or police powers. All language that would have preempted the authority of local and State authorities was purposefully left out of the amendment. Moreover, the report to accompany H.R. 5172 makes it clear that the committee intended that these investigations of structural failures be done in full cooperation with State and local officials. Lastly, the Bureau is not required to undertake any investigation; the decision of whether or not to investigate is left to the discretion of the Director of the Bureau of Standards. Section 307 is widely endorsed and recognizes the excellent and helpful role the Bureau has been performing.●

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I would just say that the gentleman from California's points are well taken and the amendment that I offer will address all the points he raised. My amendment will retain the fire research, retain the building research, and retain the computer programs.

So I agree. And the amendment will still state an 8.6-percent increase in funding versus a 14-percent increase in funding. It will be addressed primarily to new initiatives proposed by the administration and accepted by the committee along with the funding levels of the traditional programs of NBS.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5172, the National Bureau of Standards authorization bill for fiscal years 1984 and 1985. Considering the huge budget deficits we have been having over the last several years, I want to congratulate Chairman FUQUA and the Committee on Science and Technology for doing an outstanding job under difficult circumstances. In my view, the National Bureau of Standards (NBS) has much to contribute to the well-being and the increased productivity of this Nation. In this regard, proper funding of its activities will insure that NBS fulfills its mandated mission.

I also want to take this opportunity to express my appreciation for the strong support that the Science and Technology Committee has given to the Institute for Computer Sciences and Technology (ICST). Public Law 89-306, which I authored, established for the first time a program to develop ADP and communications standards for the Federal Government. The Institute, which has administered this program for almost 20 years, has done a commendable job in developing standards that have greatly benefited the Government as well as the private sector. For example, Secretary Baldrige recently announced a high level Government-industry standards project which, if successful, could increase our Nation's industrial productivity fourfold.

Notwithstanding these significant accomplishments, the administration over the last 3 years has tried to kill this program by drastically reducing its funding. While the Science and Technology Committee has successfully resisted these efforts, the Institute has been forced to operate at the same level since 1981. Clearly, we cannot expect a vigorous standards program if the Institute is to be precluded from even the nominal increases needed for inflation. I am well aware that the Institute's efforts sometimes generate opposition from vested interests, both within and outside the Government. However, given the significant savings and other benefits derived from this program, I do not believe that we can afford to acquiesce to these vested interests. In my view, any program that is saving the Government more than 10 times its cost is worth funding adequately and deserves the full support of Congress.

According to testimony in 1981 by Joe Wright, then Deputy Secretary of Commerce, the issuance of 54 Federal information-processing standards by the Institute is saving the Government about $132 million a year. Mr. Wright, currently Deputy Director of OMB, testified that a base level of $10 million in 1981 was necessary to carry out a productive program in standards development. Since OMB is mandated by law—the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1980—to revitalize the Federal standards program, I have recommended to Mr. Wright that OMB should consider increasing, rather than decreasing, funding for this important program. To date, I have not received a response from Mr. Wright. In this regard, I would hope that the Science and Technology Committee would consider a substantial increase in the future funding of the Institute.●

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, today we have under consideration H.R. 5172, the National Bureau of Standards authorizations.

This Congress failed to pass any authorizing legislation for fiscal year 1984, and this bill would take care of that situation by authorizing the Bureau of Standards for both fiscal years 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Chairman, it is out of my concern, once again, for the budget, that I will vote against this authorizing legislation. It seems incredible that with the ink barely dry on the first budget resolution, we are presented with a piece of legislation authorizing a Government agency to spend $138 million, 15 percent above the previous year's appropriations level.

Even after the adoption of the Gregg amendment, the percentage increase in this authorization is over 8 percent, more than current services increase. No agency of Government should receive funding in excess of the anticipated increase in the Consumer Price Index increase.

Granted, the National Bureau of Standards is not a large Government agency, and when compared to some of the big ticket items in the budget, it is little more than a footnote to our deficit problems. However, if equity is one of the standards that we strive for in the budget, then we should not be hesitating to ask this agency to make the same sacrifices that we ask of others.

I intend to vote against this legislation, Mr. Chairman, and I would urge my colleagues to do the same.●

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5172, the fiscal year 1985 National Bureau of Standards authorization legislation. I commend the chairman of the full Science and Technology Committee, Mr. FUQUA, and the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. WALGREN, for their excellent work on this legislation.

The National Bureau of Standards (NBS) is the Nation's oldest national laboratory, and the lead agency for measurement science and standards. The NBS is uniquely qualified and has the mission to perform measurement and standard work vital to the economic vitality of the United States, and critical to establishment of safety standards. There are a few programs I would like to highlight.

For the second consecutive year, the administration proposed to eliminate the fire research program and the building research program at the National Bureau of Standards. The administration's position is that this work can be adequately performed by the private sector. The committee conducted extensive hearings on this subject, and found that the research would be performed most appropriately and effectively by the Federal Government. Building safety and fire research are not the proper areas for skimping on spending. The major task of the NBS fire research program is to reduce fire-related residential death and injury. State governments and the private sector are simply not equipped to adequately perform this kind of work. I wholeheartedly support the Science Committee's restoration of funds for the fire and building research programs. Testimony from both industry and private sector associations gave no basis to expect that this research would be done by the private sector.

I also support the committee's continuation of funding for computer science and technology at the fiscal year 1984 level. I would prefer to see this program grow, but support the level of funding as essential to maintaining the activities of NBS in developing and implementing a coherent national information policy. The Institute for Computer Science and Technology (ICST) has a mandate to develop standards and guidelines to improve the efficiency of purchase, lease, maintenance, operation, and utilization of automatic data processing equipment within the Federal Government. The Federal Government will spend billions on computers. Ten million dollars per year to insure that this money is well spent is certainly a worthwhile investment. In addition, ICST continues to address computer security issues, assess new technologies, conduct R&D in computer test and performance measurements, and perform international networking.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, this bill authorizes $500,000 to provide the Congress and the executive branch with a basis on which to formulate Federal policy on conversion to the metric system of weights and measures. This modest amount would provide for a comprehesive survey of the current status of metric conversion so that its role in U.S. international competitiveness can be ascertained and, if necessary, strengthened. Many U.S. firms with a strong reliance on foreign trade have slowly changed to the metric system as a result of pressure to increase foreign sales. But since only three English-speaking countries—Burma, Brunei, and the United States—are not committed to the metric system, it is appropriate for the NBS to provide the Congress and the exceutive branch with the facts on which to base Federal policy decisions.

I urge my colleagues to support the fiscal year 1985 authorization for the National Bureau of Standards. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.●

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALKER: On page 9, following line 17, add the following new section:

"SEC. 205. Of the sums authorized pursuant to this title, each such sum is hereby reduced by 6.2 percent."

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the debate both yesterday and today I am somewhat reminded of the comment that Secretary Harold Brown one time made about the Soviets building military weapons.

He said: "We build and they build. And we don't build and they continue to build."

I think the same thing is true of the budget process here. The administration decreases budget and we increase. The administration increases budgets and we increase even more.

And that is precisely the problem with this bill as it was the problem with the bill yesterday.

What my amendment attempts to do is with a straight percent across-the-board decrease we try to bring this budget level into compliance with where the administration said we ought to be spending in this bill. Let us not forget that the administration budget is not a balanced budget. The administration budget is $175 billion in deficit. All this is attempting to do is keep us from spending even more than that.

So what we are attempting to do here is say that the administration allocated an 8.3-percent increase over fiscal year 1984 appropriations. This amendment, this 6.2-percent across-the-board cut would attempt to keep that 8.3-percent increase, but would keep us from going to the 14-percent increase that the committee thinks is reasonable.

I think that these increases way over what the administration says it can use are just not a reasonable way of proceeding. It seems to me that this approach is a reasonable one.

The amendment does not eliminate either the fire research program or the Center for Building Research that has been talked about here today. This is not in line with the administration's program, but the subcommittee and the committee in reviewing the work of this particular bureau discovered that these are programs that ought to be continued and I agree.

So all this does is it cuts the committee bill across the board but would continue those programs and would continue to allow them to be pursued.

The amendment does reduce the bill to the President's overall request for the National Bureau of Standards, namely, a $130 million figure.

I think if we are serious and hopefully the Members who come to this well constantly and talk about deficits are serious, if we are serious, one small step that we can take is to make this 6.2 reduction and bring the bill into compliance with where the administration says the spending level should be.

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that this kind of amendment is very attractive. In fact, there may be instances where these kinds of across-the-board cuts should be endorsed and supported.

But I think we have to ask ourselves what the underlying logic of this amendment is, particularly in this instance, because when we say we are reducing this by 6.8 percent, what we are really saying is that the administration has requested amounts which are unnecessary. That has not been my experience with this administration.

Now if we were going flatly back to the administration request, program by program, then there would be logic to returning to the administration amount. But we are not. The House widely recognizes the importance of the fire, and the building, and the computer efforts. It is our judgment that in veiw of the interests of our constituents we should not reduce those amounts.

If we keep these programs, but cut across the board, we will be reducing levels 6.8 percent or thereabouts below what the administration requested.

As demonstration that the administration does not request money needlessly, it is my understanding that the initial request from the Commerce Department to OMB for the biotechnology initiative, for example, was something in the range of $10 million.

After review by OMB, the administration requested not $10 but $3 million.

Now we have to ask ourselves: Is there unnecessary money in the administration request? I think the answer is "no." The honest approach to going absolutely back to the administration's level is to go absolutely back to their programs. But that is not recommended in this amendment because the administration zeroed out programs which I am sure even the gentleman from Pennsylvania believes are very important.

Under that analysis, I would think that it is not consistent to argue that we should return to the administration level.

PERFECTING AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GREGG TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Perfecting amendment offered by Mr. GREGG to the amendment offered by Mr. WALKER:

On page 4, line 21, strike "$57,948,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following, "$52,030,000".

On page 5, line 5, strike "$15,065,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following, "$13,728,000".

On page 6, line 12, strike "$750,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following, "$500,000".

Mr. GREGG (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA) on his point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I understand the gentleman offers as an amendment and a perfecting amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER), the Walker amendment, as I read it, adds a new section.

Therefore, this perfecting amendment would not be in order to the Walker amendment as a perfecting amendment.

It appears to be a substitute for the Walker amendment, but it is being offered as a perfecting amendment to the Walker amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire offer his amendment as a substitute or as a perfecting amendment?

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman. I will offer the amendment as a substitute.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GREGG AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment of a substitute for the Walker amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered as a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREGG as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. WALKER: On page 4, line 21, strike "$57,948,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following, "$52,030,000".

On page 5, line 5, strike "$15,065,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following, "$13,728,000".

On page 6, line 12, strike "$750,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$500,000".

□ 1520

Mr. GREGG (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr GREGG. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment which I mentioned in my opening statement which would change the Walker approach from being an across-the-board approach to being a targeted approach.

First, I would like to address the concerns raised by the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALGREN), who has stated that there is no relationship between these numbers and what the President has requested because they do not go to the President's numbers.

Well, I think it is the job of our committee to move dollars around. I think it is also the job of our committee to acknowledge the fact that we are dealing with an overall budget, not just a single budget of NBS, but a budget of the entire spending of the Federal Government, and then when we get a budget before us that was presented in good faith by the administration which reflects an 8.6-percent increase in spending, at a time when we have got a $200 billion deficit, that agency has been fairly treated by the administration, and I think we have a certain obligation to try to stay within that level of increases versus adding onto that level of increases, which is what we have done here.

The amendment, as noted in the previous debate, while the budget increases for 1984 are healthy, it does so at the expense of zeroing out programs with strong congressional and private and public support, that being fire research and the building research programs.

Thus, my amendment would keep those programs at their present funded level. There would be no reduction, across-the-board or any other way, in those programs.

Basically, the areas that my amendment addresses involve the new initiatives areas which I discussed in my prior statement. There is a $2 million item in the budget, which is eliminated, in the area for new telephones. I agree that the NBS could probably use new telephones but I do not think at a time of this sort of deficit situation that we should add the new telephones.

There is a reduction in my budget for the supercomputer purchase. The reason the reduction is in there is not to limit their ability to get into supercomputers but to encourage them to get into it through the lease approach versus the outright purchase approach. In other words, I do not believe that my reduction is going to significantly impact NBS' ability to get into the issue of supercomputers. All it is going to do is put some pressure on them to look at it from a different perspective from the one they are presently looking at it from.

We also have a couple of new initiatives which were requested—they are not major in funding, that we have taken out, but we have retrained two of the new initiatives of the five new initiatives which the administration wanted and, therefore, we have at least allowed for some of that area. We have continued the new initiative in cold neutron activity. This, I think, is very important for the building technology trade, for determining tolerances of various materials, and, in my opinion, it is a very appropriate new initiative and is one which we have retained.

There is $1 million across-the-board cut through my proposal in the national measurements laboratories. However, I would represent that this is not a cut. This is actually a reduction again in the increase that is proposed down to $4 million from the $5 million which is in the committee bill.

We also retain the Japanese language translation at $500,000, which I think is a very appropriate new initiative, not necessarily a new initiative, but an additional initiative in the area of translation.

So, as an amendment which goes to trying to balance the equities in the situation, the equities being the need to have NBS be treated fairly in its various areas, along with the fact that we are facing a $200 billion deficit, I think this amendment is reasonable, it gives us an 8.6-percent increase in the agency, at the same time maintaining the fire research, the building research, the computer activities, giving the key new initiative in the cold neutron area, but while acknowledging the fact that we have got to stop somewhere and the best place to stop is at 8.6 percent versus adding 14 percent.

I must ask my fellow Members of this body here: We cannot look at this through tunnel vision. We must acknowledge the fact that with each one of these agencies, no matter how small, they all add up. The Everett Dirksen Building, for example, a billion here, a billion there—it adds up to be real money. Well, it also counts for millions, a million here, a million there, it adds up to be billions, which adds up to be a billion here and a billion there.

Let us face it, if we as a Congress, cannot face up to one simple little budget, the NBS budget, and say we are going to give them an 8.6-percent increase versus a 14-percent increase, then, my goodness, how are we ever going to handle defense?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. GREGG) has expired.

(On request of Mr. WALKER and by unanimous consent, Mr. GREGG was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, if I understand what the gentleman's amendment does, it essentially saves the same amount of money that was in my original amendment, the 6.2 percent, but what the gentleman is doing is taking a targeted approach and assuring that what we are doing is not the across-the-board thing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania objected to, but, rather, has targeted in on specific programs where we can demonstrate specific savings; is that generally correct?

Mr. GREGG. Yes. What I have done is basically look at some of the programs that they have asked for in new initiatives and suggested that they take different approaches, and basically eliminated $2 million of new telephone equipment for the NBS.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will yield further, if we proceed along that route, then, we will be within the administration's budget, and we will have done it in a way in which the administration of none of the programs will be adversely impacted; is that the gentleman's belief?

Mr. GREGG. None of the ongoing programs at the agency will be adversely impacted. In fact, I would argue that they would be very positively impacted. Many of them receive significant increases within the 8.6-percent overall growth of the agency.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I thank the gentleman for his explanation, and I think in many ways what he does in his substitute probably improves upon my original language, and I thank the gentleman for his presentation.

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I yield to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Chairman, I certainly would like to say that this approach has much more to recommend itself than the across-the-board reduction, particularly because we do believe that the administration has recommended absolutely essential funding in a number of areas that an across-the-board reduction cut.

As a point of clarification, as I understand the gentleman's amendment, the gentleman would essentially not pick up the administration request on biotechnology?

Mr. GREGG. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. GREGG) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. WALGREN and by unanimous consent, Mr. GREGG was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. GREGG. I should have addressed the biotechnology, and I apologize, so if the gentleman will give me a few more minutes, I will address myself to that.

The reason I did not pick up the biotechnology issue is, I happen to feel that within the entire Government we are seeing a number of major initiatives in the biotechnology area. However, we are not seeing a great deal of coordination in this area. For the NBS to get into biotechnology and start developing standards before the Government in other areas, such as addressing it on a regulatory basis and addressing it in a coordination basis, has gotten into it, I think is premature. I suspect someday NBS will get into biotechnology measurement, but right now I believe it is premature, considering what I perceive as total disarray in the biotechnology area of Government research, because there is a great deal of money being spent without adequate coordination.

Mr. WALGREN. So this amendment would pick up $3 million in biotechnology and pick up approximately $6 million in the computer acquisition, compared to the administration's request?

Mr. GREGG. That would be correct relative to the administration's request. Relative to the committee bill, however, it would only be about 1.5, I think, something like that.

Mr. WALGREN. So you get about 4.5 between biotechnology and computer acquisition, and then you added another 1 in the generalized reduction in the measurement area?

Mr. GREGG. That is correct. Plus there is money taken out of the new initiatives.

Mr. WALGREN. I thank the gentleman.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FUQUA TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GREGG AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FUQUA TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GREGG as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. WALKER: Strike "$52,030,000" and insert "$57,348,000".

Strike "$13,728,000" and insert "$13,665,000".

Strike the last two lines of the amendment and at the end of the amendment add the following:

In section 201(a)(2) strike "$23,194,000" and insert "$22,696,000".

Mr. FUQUA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I offer to the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire is an attempt to try to make some reductions but not impact the programs quite as severely as the gentleman from New Hampshire does in his amendment.

Let me say that the gentleman's amendment is offered in good faith, it is a constructive amendment, and I applaud the gentleman for trying to accomplish the objectives that he is in this fashion, because I think it is a constructive method that he is going about.

□ 1530

However, in certain areas there is some disagreement in the amount that would be impacted on some of the programs. The amendment that I have is approximately a $2.5 million reduction in the overall bill. It does, as pointed out in the colloquy between the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) and the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. GREGG) it does retain the moneys, the $2.4 million in the biotechnology program.

In the general technology support, there is $1.4 million reduction for a new scientific computer at NBS. The administration had requested, Mr. Chairman, some $8.9 million; the committee reduced that by about half. This amendment or additional funds will be provided to compete in fiscal year 1986. This amendment does reduce that somewhat, and it is very similar to the Gregg amendment.

One of the areas in the computer area that I would like to point out, under the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire, is that they would not be able to complete the purchase, and they would have to continue to lease a computer. That is one way to acquire one, but in the outyears it is going to cost about $2.5 million more as a penalty for going ahead with a 3-year lease/purchase rather than a 2-year purchase.

I would hope that in an effort of accommodation that we could adopt the amendment that I have offered to the gentleman's substitute amendment. It makes some reductions; it preserves some of the initiatives that had been requested by the administration that they felt were very important. I would hope that my colleagues could see fit to support the reductions that I have offered so that we can get on with this bill and complete it as early this evening as we possibly could.

Mr. WINN. Mr Chairman, I move to strike the last word and rise in support of the Gregg amendment.

Mr. Chairman, first I would tell our chairman that we appreciate his effort to negotiate at the very last minute a new amount of money that was unknown to all of us until about an hour ago. This is particularly strange after we, as he pointed out, held 4 days of hearings on this bill. I guess after the close results of the NSF votes yesterday that the chairman figured that he would have a better chance if he cut this back a little bit.

We do appreciate any cuts that the majority side would care to offer, but this does not go far enough. As authorizations go, and in the context of a Federal budget in the hundreds of billions of dollars, the authorization for the National Bureau of Standards is not a large amount of money. Nevertheless, we have in this authorization another example of the inability of this House and many of its committees to exercise some fiscal restraint in formulating annual authorizations. Once again I want to congratulate the gentleman from New Hampshire for offering this responsible alternative amendment. His amendment would reduce this authorization to the President's request—an already generous amount for NBS.

The Gregg amendment is not a duplicate of the administration request for NBS in all respects. Based on the hearings that our committee held on the request, we believe that the Center for Fire Research, the Center for Building Technology, and the Institute for Computer Science and Technology should be reauthorized. In this, we differ with the administration. However, in order to provide appropriate funding for these areas, the Gregg amendment correctly makes prudent reductions in other areas within NBS. The overall result of this is that this amendment will authorize NBS at the same bottom line total as requested by the administration. The alternative provided in the committee bill would be some 6 percent over the President's request.

Mr. Chairman, we are faced in this authorization with a situation similar to the one we faced with the National Science Foundation. That is, the President requested for fiscal year 1985 a substantial healthy increase for the National Bureau of Standards from the fiscal year 1984 appropriation of $120 million, to a fiscal year 1985 level of approximately $130 million. For some reason, this healthy increase of 8½ percent, $10 million, was not adequate for some on our committee and we have here an increase of $8 million above the request. I can understand in the past that there have been some instances where programs in other areas have been cut by the administration and some Members want to see those cuts restored. This is not the case with the National Bureau of Standards. This agency has faired extremely well under the Reagan administration and continues to do so. It is just not responsible to add $8 million to this authorization.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support the Gregg amendment and to bring this authorization back in line with the President's request.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FUQUA) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. GREGG) as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALKER) there were—ayes 1, noes 12.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXIII, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the pending question following the quorum call. Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GREGG TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. GREGG. The Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREGG to the amendment offered by Mr. WALKER: Strike all after "SEC. 205." and add the following:

Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, there are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Commerce for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, to carry out activities performed by the National Bureau of Standards, the sums set forth in the following line items:

(1) Measurement Research and Standards, $52,030,000.

(2) Engineering Measurements and Standards, $23,194,000.

(3) Computer Science and Technology, $10,000,000.

(4) Core Research Program for Innovation and Productivity, $12,168,000.

(5) Technical Competence Fund, $8,598,000.

(6) Fire Research Center, $5,827,000.

(7) Central Technical Support, $13,728,000.

OFFICE OF PRODUCTIVITY, TECHNOLOGY AND INNOVATION

(a) In addition to the sums authorized to be appropriated by section 201, there is authorized to be appropriated to the Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Productivity, Technology, and Innovation, for fiscal year 1985, the sum of $4,121,000 for the purpose of research, development, and related activities in the field of innovation and productivity.

(b) Of the sum authorized to be appropriated in subsection (a), the Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Productivity, Technology and Innovation is authorized and directed to expend $500,000 for the purpose of substantially increasing the availability of Japanese science and engineering literature to United States scientists and engineers through increased accessibility, monitoring, screening, translation, abstracting, indexing, dissemination, awareness, and marketing. In the conduct of this activity the Assistant Secretary is authorized to make grants and contracts with private for profit, nonprofit, and educational organizations and to provide funds to other government organizations, to coordinate with other government organizations, and to utilize (for all or part of this effort) the Director, staff, and facilities of the National Technical Information Service.

Mr. GREGG (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask uanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I reserve a point of order. I have not had a copy of the amendment. I reserve a point of order against the amendment at this time, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida reserves a point of order against the amendment.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, if I can explain to the body what is happening here, I am reoffering in a form which I believe is appropriate and which I believe is in order and I apologize for not getting a copy to the Chairman, but because of the parliamentary exigencies that have occurred during this debate, it was impossible to get a copy to the gentleman, but I believe one is being delivered to him right now.

I am reoffering the amendment which would allow for the 8.6-percent increase in NBS funding versus the present 12½-percent increase which the Fuqua amendment to my amendment allows.

We have gone through the language of this debate, but just to quickly review it for those who were not present, essentially my amendment maintains all the basic functions of the NBS and significantly increases funding for NBS, but it does not add on top of the funding increases which were proposed by the administration.

At a time when we face a $200 billion deficit it is just very hard for me to believe that if we cannot draw the line with an 8.6-percent real growth increase in an agency of this size, then how are we ever going to get a $200 billion deficit under control?

So I would ask that the body reconsider, since it has not had the opportunity to vote directly on my amendment, which is a $6 million reduction from the committee bill, but still represents an 8.6-percent real growth in the agency, I would ask the body to reconsider and vote in favor of this amendment.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. So I can better understand, if I may, I would like to know again the procedure we find ourselves in. As I understand, we had an original amendment that was supposed to cut—how much money?

Mr. GREGG. We had an original amendment, if I can run through the scenario if I am current on it, which was the Walker amendment, which was a 5-percent across-the-board cut—6.2-percent across-the-board cut, to which I offered a substitute which was a specific targeted approximately $6 million cut.

My substitute was then amended by the Fuqua amendment which reduced my reduction to a $2.5 milion targeted cut.

I am now reoffering my $6 million cut, which is not a cut, it allows for an 8.6-percent real growth in the agency. It is a reduction in the rate of growth amendment to the original Walker amendment.

□ 1610

Mr. VOLKMER. Then you would be actually, if we vote on your amendment we are really just revoting on the Fuqua amendment?

Mr. GREGG. No; this would not be a revote of the Fuqua amendment. The Fuqua amendment represented less of a reduction than my amendment that is now pending. This is an entirely different amendment.

Mr. VOLKMER. But your amendment was already pending at the time we voted on the Fuqua amendment?

Mr. GREGG. Excuse me. This is a new amendment.

Mr. VOLKMER. But basically your amendment would do what you propose to do if the Fuqua amendment had not been adopted; is that not correct?

Mr. GREGG. That is correct. My amendment would have stood had not the Fuqua amendment been adopted.

Mr. VOLKMER. So upon voting for your amendment we are basically revoting on the Fuqua amendment because the House has already decided that the Fuqua amendment should prevail over your amendment?

Mr. GREGG. I do not believe that is true. What you are voting on here is the opportunity to allow an 8.6-percent real growth in that agency and institute a $6 million cut.

What you are voting on is fiscal responsibility and the issue of whether this Congress has the courage to reduce the deficit in at least this one little, tiny agency while still giving that agency a significant rate of growth.

Mr. VOLKMER. If we adopt your amendment then the Fuqua amendment is abrogated; is that correct?

Mr. GREGG. No. The Fuqua amendment still stands and is pending. You will get to choose between the two.

Mr. VOLKMER. Is yours as a substitute?

Mr. GREGG. No. Mine is an amendment to the Walker amendment.

Mr. VOLKMER. Your amendment originally was an amendment to the Walker amendment?

Mr. GREGG. It was a substitute.

Mr. VOLKMER. So if we vote on the Walker amendment and yours as an amendment, how much do we totally vote on on the Walker amendment as your amendment goes to it, though? He has an across-the-board cut of 6.2 percent. You have a targeted cut in addition?

Mr. GREGG. No. My amendment replaces the Walker across-the-board cut with a targeted cut which arrives at essentially the same number.

Mr. VOLKMER. Against that we will still have the Fuqua amendment?

Mr. GREGG. Then both the Fuqua amendment and my amendment of $6 million would be pending and you would have a choice against extravagant spending or reasonable spending.

Mr. VOLKMER. Either way you want to characterize it the way you see, and if we adopt your amendment to the Walker amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. GREGG) has expired.

(On request of Mr. VOLKMER and by unanimous consent Mr. GREGG was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. VOLKMER. As I understand it, if we vote for your amendment and add your additional amount as an addition to the Walker amendment, when that is done then if we vote then we would have to vote again on the Fuqua amendment as a substitute; is that not correct?

Mr. GREGG. Yes; I guess you would have that.

Mr. VOLKMER. That is the parliamentary procedure we would be in. We would be voting on the very same thing I said before we just got through voting on.

Mr. GREGG. I appreciate the gentleman's confidence in my parliamentary acumen, but it appears to me if you take my advice what you have is a clear vote on a $6 million reduction in an agency account which will, as a result of that vote, give you an 8.6-percent real growth in that agency, and that is entirely different than a $2.5 million reduction in that account.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida insist on his point of order?

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and I will not take the full amount of time. But, as the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER) pointed out, this is a very clever parliamentary maneuver to get the same vote we just took a few minutes ago.

I would urge the Members to vote no on the amendment so that we can get on with the business of the committee. We will spend more money debating this issue than is saved by this vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. GREGG) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GREGG) there were—ayes 88, noes 63.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

Mr. YATES changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Just so the Members can understand where we are now and I will try briefly to explain it, we are now voting on the Fuqua amendment to the original Gregg substitute which would put us back at a $2 million reduction, instead of the $6 million which the Members just voted.

It seems to me that having taken this move to reduce this budget's rate of growth by $6 million, leaving an 8.6-percent real growth in the budget, it would be reasonable to maintain that by voting "no" on the Fuqua substitute.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

As I tried to point out in my discussion before the last vote, we are right back to where we were on not just the last vote, but the vote prior to the last vote. It is the exact thing.

Mr. GREGG. No, no.

Mr. VOLKMER. Yes; it is. It is the exact same vote.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, reclaiming my time, we obviously are not back at the same point because this body has just agreed to reduce the rate of growth for this agency by $6 million instead of $2.5 million. I think that is a significant statement as to our willingness to, at least in this small agency, try to get some budget frugality.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we are essentially back at the same vote that we were previously when the Fuqua amendment was adopted to the Gregg substitute.

I might point out for clarification—I know the gentleman did not intentionally mean that—the amendment is a $2.5 million cut, rather than a $2 million cut.

I would urge an "aye" vote on this amendment which we have already had before and it saves the time of the House. I urge an "aye" vote.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FUQUA. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to say if a Member would wish to remain consistent—I know many Members may not—they would vote the same way on this amendment as they did previously on the Fuqua amendment to Gregg.

Mr. FUQUA. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FUQUA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. THOMAS of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

My understanding is then that the gentleman is urging an "aye" vote on the Fuqua substitute to the Gregg substitute, which is a $2.5 million cut. And if one voted "no" the Gregg amendment to the Walker amendment would be sustained and that is a $6 million cut.

So a "no" is a $6 million cut and a "yes" is a $2.5 million cut; is that correct?

Mr. FUQUA. I say to the gentleman the vote is the identical issue that was before the House when the Fuqua amendment to the Gregg substitute was adopted.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I know the distinguished chairman of the committee did not want to inadvertently affect anyone's vote by indicating that it is exactly the same vote because it is not.

We have had parliamentary activity occur between the last vote and this vote. The parliamentary activity that occurred was the Gregg amendment to the Walker amendment which was a $6 million cut and which passed overwhelmingly.

Now if you vote in favor of the Fuqua substitute, it is a $2.5 million cut.

If you vote "no," the Gregg amendment to the Walker amendment stands and that is a $6 million cut.

It is not an identical situation. There is a clear choice. "No" is a $6 million cut. "Yes" is a $2.5 million cut.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. GREGG), as amended, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER), as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 123, noes 172, not voting 138, as follows:

Mr. HUGHES changes his vote from "aye" to "no."

Mr. McCURDY changes his vote from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment, as amended, offered as a substitute for the amendment, as amended, was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER), as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. RUDD

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RUDD: Beginning on page 7, line 1, strike the entire section 204.

(Mr. RUDD asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am offering strikes the provisions of title II which authorize a $500,000 2-year metric evaluation study.

In 1978, the General Accounting Office (GAO) concluded the most complete and objective analysis of metric use and conversion in the United States and found that the benefits of conversion would be negligible, but that the costs would be substantial—in the billions of dollars.

The Commerce Department completed an earlier study and found that "the notion that the United States is losing exports to metric countries * * * is ill-founded,"

Numerous other reports have also been issued. Whether for or against conversion to the metric system, it should be clear that enough studies have been completed and enough money spent. The U.S. Metric Board was allocated more than $8.7 million during its 5-year existence between fiscal year 1978 and fiscal year 1982. Since the time the funding for the Board was terminated by the 97th Congress, more than $600,000 has been budgeted to the Office of Metric Programs at the Department of Commerce.

Let me emphasize that I do not oppose use of the metric system. Those who wish to convert to metric or stand to gain from it, can legally convert and should do so. Our Nation's current policy—established back in 1866—allows the use of either the metric system or our customary system of weights and measures. However, I strongly oppose Government's unwarranted promotion and costly imposition of metric on the American people who do not wish to convert and stand no benefit from conversion.

The fact is that the American people, without question, oppose conversation to the metric system.

Furthermore, Congress, which has the sole authority under article I, section 8 of the Constitution to fix the standard of weights and measures, has never authorized nor endorsed forced conversion to metric.

However, we are not debating whether or not to commit our Nation to the metric system at this time. What we are considering is whether or not to spend another $500,000 on a study which duplicates past efforts. In my view, enough has been spent. If we are to consider whether or not to mandate use of the metric system, we ought to do so on the basis of the abundance of information which is already available. This expenditure of taxpayers moneys is simply an effort to imperially mandate the metric system on the people of the United States.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, the question here really is not the $500,000. I do not think the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. RUDD) seriously feels that that is an important matter.

What is at stake here is the question of what is the policy of the United States. The gentleman quite correctly cited that policy. He knows it thoroughly and I know it thoroughly, and the GAO study knows it thoroughly, and I will quote it. The GAO study says:

The United States has a policy of allowing for voluntary conversion, a choice of converting or not converting. This has been the policy since 1866 when the metric system was authorized. During the intervening years, use of the metric system has increased.

In fact, during the past 10 to 15 years it has begun to increase substantially as we became more and more involved in international trade and all of the rest of the world is metric. Only the United States, Burma, and Brunei no longer are metric. Canada, Australia, and Britain have all gone through the conversion process within the last few years.

Now, the automobile industry has converted, the wine and spirits industry has converted, the pharmaceutical industry has converted, the suppliers to the automobile industry are beginning to convert.

The question before us really is: Will the United States provide some assistance to this conversion, voluntary conversion, or will it not? In this connection, there has been a misconstruction of policy. We originally, in enacting the Metric Conversion Act, said "Yes, we will help those who wish to convert voluntarily."

Then what happened was that we set up a Board that supervised this. This administration came in and abolished the Board. We had a small budget to assist them. That budget was abolished. Today the only organ in existence is a private industry American National Metric Council which recommended this study in order to determine what the current situation is with regard to whether or not and how much the cost versus the benefits of conversion were today, not 10 years, today in a rapidly changing situation.

The gentleman from Arizona (Mr. RUDD) very properly does not believe in metric conversion. He does not want to see anything in this legislation which would provide any incentive to study it any more or do anything else, and that is his privilege. But this is what private industry has asked for as a way of facilitating their voluntary conversion.

That is all we are asking for; not a change in policy; an opportunity to assist private industry.

The gentleman from Arizona did not quote the whole GAO report. The report shows that the bulk of the Fortune 500 industries are already in the process of conversion. They would like further information on this. Many other segments of business are converting and I think it is time to make it clear that this country is not ambiguous. We are not going backward. We are going to continue to help industry in this country that wants to voluntarily convert to metric, and we are going to make it easy for them. That is the purpose of this.

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of California. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALGREN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think we should remember that we are only providing by authorization $500,000 in this measure. We cannot do very much for $500,000. We can really probably only ask ourselves in a responsible way the question whether we should assist industries in voluntarily converting.

Something very dramatic has happened between the GAO study in the late 1970's and where we are in 1984, and that is that our basic industries have gone through the floor. We have told them that they now must operate in an international market, most of which is metric, and it seems to me that under those circumstances the least we can do is spend a little effort to ask ourselves the question of how much support we should give in terms of allowing them or enabling them to relate to the metric system.

Mr. BROWN of California. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of California. I gladly yield to the distinguished gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. RUDD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we are not talking about voluntarily turning into metric because of what this bill will do. The only purpose that this $500,000 presumably is for is to produce another study.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BROWN of California was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. BROWN of California. I yield further to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RUDD. Whether it was 10 years ago or last year, the results are the same. Let the marketplace determine whether or not we are going to convert to metric. But if we continue to fund programs that will lead to or keep the metric system alive, the purpose really is to impose it on the people of the United States, and that is the only way the metric system has ever been adopted by any country. It has been by imperial decree.

I would just disagree with the gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN) for whom I have great respect with regard to the fact that there are only three countries in the world that have not mandated the use of metric. As a matter of fact, England, Canada, New Zealand, have all attempted to impose the metric system much in the way the Metric Board, which is defunct now, attempted to do it in the United States, and in each case the people of those countries summarily rejected the use of the metric system as the only weights and measurements that could be used on a national scale.

Since we do have the ability to use the metric system since 1866, or not use it, as we might choose, the companies who are involved in the studies that were provided by the exhaustive 2-year study of the GAO indicated that the only reason that they might want to go to it is where it would be beneficial to them and there would be no danger in them doing that; that they could go ahead and adopt it and use it without imposing the system on the rest of the United States and on the citizens, where it would cost billions of dollars to convert.

But I see no need to spend any more money or any more effort on another exhaustive study, whatever it might be, and I urge rejection of the amendment on that basis alone.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I will not belabor this. I think we have been through this debate often enough. I think the gentleman from Arizona has correctly phrased the problem.

The gentleman thinks that this half million dollars will keep the metric system alive, and he does not want to keep it alive. Obviously, I think we should keep it alive as an option for American industry and, therefore, I urge that you vote no on the amendment.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. RUDD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I made a mistake. I would like to urge adoption of the amendment when we get to the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. RUDD).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUDD) there were—ayes 38, noes 41.

So the motion was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT) having assumed the chair, Mr. RICHARDSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5172) to authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Commerce for the programs of the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 and for related purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2597. An act to authorize the awarding of special congressional gold medals to the daughter of Harry S. Truman, to Lady Bird Johnson, and to Elie Wiesel.

AUTHORIZING AWARDING OF SPECIAL CONGRESSIONAL GOLD MEDALS TO DAUGHTER OF HARRY S. TRUMAN, LADY BIRD JOHNSON, AND ELIE WIESEL

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 2597) to authorize the awarding of special congressional gold medals to the daughter of Harry S. Truman, to Lady Bird Johnson, and to Elie Wiesel, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 2597

SEC. 4. The medals provided for in this Act are national medals for the purposes of section 5111 of title 31, United States Code.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, two of the gold medal bills, Harry S. Truman and Lady Bird Johnson, have passed the House unanimously. Because of a technical amendment required by the Senate Budget Committee, we are dealing with those two bills again.

The third medal is for Elie Wiesel in recognition of his humanitarian efforts and outstanding contributions to world literature and human rights. In the course of 25 years, Mr. Wiesel has published the same number of novels, short stories, and essays on topics ranging from the Holocaust to religion in America. He is perhaps most famous for the novel "Night," which detailed a teenager's experience in a concentration camp.

As Chairman of the President's Commission on the Holocaust and as Chairman of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, Elie Wiesel devotes much of his energies toward keeping the memory of the Holocaust alive in the world today. In addition, he has worked toward the cause of human rights in Biafra, Cambodia, Central America, and the Soviet Union. He is currently serving as the Andrew W. Mellon professor in the humanities at Boston University.

Among the numerous awards he has received are the International Literary Prize for Peace and the Prix Medicis of France. Additionally, he holds honorary degrees from 25 universities in the United States and Israel.

Since there is a White House ceremony honoring Mr. Wiesel on the 29th of this month, I have been asked to move this legislation in an expeditious manner so that the announcement of the gold medal can be made at the ceremony.

A companion bill has more than the required 218 cosponsors so it does comply with the rules of the Consumer Affairs and Coinage Subcommittee.

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I rise in strong support of this measure, which authorizes the President to award a gold medal to Elie Wiesel in recognition of his outstanding efforts and achievements as a humanitarian and in literature. Not only is Elie Weisel being honored by this legislation today, but the memories of the 6 million Jews who perished in the Holocaust are being honored as well, since Elie Wiesel has become the living voice—the author for these martyrs.

No single individual is more deserving for recognition by Congress and the President than this literary giant. He has shown the world that nonviolence and love of one's fellow human beings transcends even the most horrifying personal memories. All too often we are confronted by the question—"does man make history, or does history make the man?" In Elie Wiesel's case, it is undoubtedly both. Because of his experiences during those exceptionally dark years of the Holocaust, Elie Wiesel has been transformed into this generation's most thoughtful and provoking writer and lecturer. Indeed, he has become our conscience. The silent legacy left by 6 million men, women, and children, has been given a richness that can only be told by Elie Wiesel. He has come to embody the last survivor upon whose shoulders now lies the burden of speaking out on behalf of all those who have suffered through the ages. Elie Wiesel's dedication to mankind has spanned religious and national boundaries, and he has not hesitated to aid all those who seek an eloquent spokesman.

Many have written and discussed the foreboding warnings of George Orwell's "1984." In an era where darkness has loomed continually on the horizon, it is incumbent upon us to do everything in our power to dispel the fears that the novel has instilled in so many people. These past decades have plunged our planet into more despair than ever thought possible; yet, Elie Wiesel has always been there to quietly but forcefully remind us of the inherent good in man.

Elie Wiesel's contributions to the people of this Nation and to the world's literature eminently qualifies him to receive this gold medal. By conferring this honor, Congress and the President demonstrates our dedication to the triumph of good over evil, and to the memories of all those who could not make their own voices heard.●

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to be an original cosponsor of S. 2597 awarding a congressional gold medal to Elie Wiesel.

Since April 29 begins the week of Days of Remembrance for victims of the Holocaust it is especially appropriate that Elie Wiesel be the recipient of this award. Through his vigilence and testimony as a survivor of the Holocaust he reminds us that such an event is in the realm of possibility and must not happen again.

As a member of the Holocaust Memorial Council, I have witnessed firsthand that Elie Wiesel has contributed to history, to humanity and to freedom everywhere.●

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to express my support for S. 2597, which would direct the President to award a gold medal to Elie Wiesel for his contribution to human rights.

As a survivor of Auschwitz, Elie Wiesel has served as a major spokesman and symbol for all Holocaust survivors. Elie Wiesel has dedicated his life to many noble causes and his efforts to record the horrifying history of the Holocaust have been essential in reminding the world that we must continually guard against any future recurrence of the inhumanity and horror of the Holocaust. The publication of his novel "Night," signaled the beginning of a series of novels, short stories, and essays which transformed the horrors of his experience into moving and enduring works of literature and a testament to his perseverence.

Today, Elie Wiesel continues to fight against injustice and for the cause of human rights on all fronts. Elie Wiesel has spoken out on behalf of the oppressed, the exploited, and the deprived people of the world. He has traveled, written, and worked for the cause of human rights in places like Biafra, Lebanon, Cambodia, the Soviet Union, and Central America. He has been honored for these activities by governments all over the world. Elie Wiesel has provided a much needed voice for thousands of people who have been oppressed and deprived of even the most basic of human rights. He has been a tireless spokesman for the cause of justice and freedom for all people the world over.

As his adopted country, it is appropriate for the United States to recognize Elie Wiesel's outstanding and important contribution to humanity. Mr. Wiesel's work reminds all Americans that the freedoms and rights we enjoy as citizens of the United States are not to be taken lightly. By honoring Elie Wiesel we honor a man who has spent a lifetime fighting for the very principles this country was founded upon; we honor a man who has not turned his back on the millions of oppressed people who so desperately need our support; and we honor a man who has done so much to further the cause of dignity and freedom of all men and women.

Mr. Speaker, it is particularly appropriate that we honor Elie Wiesel immediately prior to the Days of Remembrance for Victims of the Holocaust, a weeklong commemoration beginning on April 29. The Holocaust is one of the darkest chapters in the history of mankind, and it must not be forgotten.

Yet, while we pay tribute to Elie Wiesel and commemorate the millions of other courageous victims of the Holocaust, we must not forget the perpetrators of those atrocities, especially the Nazi war criminals who still remain at large. The knowledge that persons charged with Nazi war crimes have taken sanctuary in countries which refuse to extradite them to face their charges continues to haunt the survivors of the Holocaust and all of us who value justice.

I am outraged that this tragic situation is allowed to persist and I have authored legislation to help bring this final chapter of the Holocaust to a just end. My bill, H.R. 3036, would suspend all U.S. military and economic assistance to those countries known to be harboring Nazi war criminals, including Syria, Argentina, Paraguay, Chile, and Canada, until those countries take the necessary steps to extradite those criminals. By bringing the remaining Nazi war criminals to justice we would be honoring the memory of those who did not survive the Holocaust, and we would be making life a little easier for those who did, including Elie Wiesel.●

● Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the resolution offered by Messrs. KEMP and YATES to provide for the awarding of a gold medal to Elie Wiesel in recognition of his outstanding humanitarian and literary contributions to the world.

I am the son of two who survived Hitler's reign of terror, and, therefore constantly aware of the memories and nightmares that haunt those who lived through man's darkest hours.

And yet there is a man among us who has chosen to live with these memories every day for the sake of mankind. He is an acclaimed author, teacher, and moral spokesman; a man who will disturb your peace of mind for the benefit of mankind and not let you remain indifferent to events that could trigger another catastrophe. He is Elie Wiesel, a man worthy of the Nobel Peace Prize.

On October 28, 1981, Professor Wiesel addressed the International Liberator's Conference held at the State Department of the United States. I was there. The room was filled with those who had liberated the concentration camps as well as survivors, Christians and Jews, peoples from all political systems and ideologies. He spoke to the audience fighting back despair with his every word. Using words to overcome silence. Silence that can only mean complicity in the face of evil. He began by saying that it was not easy to speak. "Suffering is a private matter, a personal matter. And yet if we had not decided to share with you—our memories—then I am afraid we would have caused humanity to be ashamed now even more for what it let be done them. Therefore we bear witness for all men and on behalf of all men and go on bearing witness in spite of everything. We must prevent more violence, more wars, and unmask hatred. Unless we do that, mankind has no chance of survival."

Wiesel has continuously reminded us that "the human community must dedicate itself to the ideal." He cries out for peace in the name of the 1 million murdered Jewish children who were never given the opportunity to grow in the light of peace. In the name of humanity he has traveled to Cambodia to witness the senseless loss of so many who were killed by a madman. And again the world kept silent. Wiesel reminded the world that the St. Louis was turned away from safe shores to return to Hitler's Europe. We cannot afford to repeat such action with the boat people.

Wiesel disturbs his audience with his message, worrying that we have forgotten what the face of evil looks like. Perhaps only he and his fellow survivors really know its full measure.

It is time to recognize this messenger who has witnessed the abyss, and therefore, I would urge my colleagues to vote for S. 2597 in recognition of Elie Wiesel's humanitarian efforts and outstanding contributions to world literature and human rights.●

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of S. 2597, a bill which would award a gold medal to Elie Wiesel in recognition of his outstanding contributions to world literature and human rights. I am proud to join with my colleagues today in honoring Professor Wiesel—a man who has spent a lifetime reminding all Americans that the personal freedoms and rights we in this Nation know and enjoy are not to be taken for granted.

In the course of 25 years, Mr. Wiesel has published numerous novels, short stories, and essays on human rights. He is perhaps best known for the novel "Night," which detailed a teenager's experience in a concentration camp. It is through this, and other literary works, that Elie Wiesel transformed the horrors of his personal experience in Auschwitz into a moving and enduring testament to survival and reminder to all mankind.

It is particularly appropriate that the Congress and the President pay tribute to Elie Wiesel as we commence the week of Days of Remembrance for the courageous victims of the Holocaust. On April 30 survivors of the Nazi horrors will gather for the symbolic groundbreaking—transformation of two buildings donated by the Federal Government—into the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Not only is Elie Wiesel being honored today, but the memories of the 6 million Jews who perished in the Holocaust are being honored as well. Through his vigilance and testimony as a survivor of the Holocaust he reminds us that such an atrocity must happen "Never Again."●

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on S. 2597, the Senate bill just passed.

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS TO ATTACK THE PROBLEM OF INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 98-211)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Thursday, April 26, 1984.)

STATEMENT OF SENATOR STROM THURMOND

(Mr. HARTNETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues in the House a statement made by the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina, STROM THURMOND. Senator THURMOND's statement was made at the dedication ceremony, of the Gen. Edwin A. Pollock memorial and causeway in Beaufort, S.C. I wish to also share with my colleagues several newspaper articles addressing this important occasion:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR STROM THURMOND AT THE DEDICATION CEREMONY OF THE GENERAL EDWIN A. POLLOCK MEMORIAL AND CAUSEWAY, BEAUFORT, SOUTH CAROLINA, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 18, 1984, 10:30 A.M.

Major Chambers, Mayor Robinson, General McMonagle, Colonel Jones and other distinguished military officers, Reverend Sells, and men and women of the armed forces, distingished guests, ladies and gentlemen: It is a distinct pleasure to be in Beaufort this morning to join with all of you in honoring a great American, an outstanding military leader, and a valuable members of the Beaufort community, our good friend, the late General Edwin A. Pollock. The dedication of the General Edwin A. Pollock memorial and causeway is a truly significant occasion in Beaufort history, and I am particularly proud to be a part of this special event. The General Pollock Memorial Committee is to be commended for their fine efforts in making this project a reality.

General Pollock traveled this road many times—several years ago while serving as Commanding General of the Marine Corps Recruit Depot at Parris Island; and later as a private Beaufort citizen visiting that important training installation. In many ways, it is appropriate that the land link connecting Parris Island to Beaufort and Port Royal is being named for this dedicated patriot because it symbolizes General Pollock's contributions in bridging the gap between the military and civilian communities. Indeed, he was a goodwill ambassador highly respected by both groups.

We gather here today to immortalize and pay tribute to this man who has been called a "Marine's Marine"—a superior designation reserved for only the best of this elite group of soldiers—yet, a fitting description of a remarkable man who devoted 38 years of his life in service to our Nation.

General Pollock's distinguished military career began early in life. In 1917, after studying for a year at Staunton Military Academy in Virginia, he transferred to one of America's foremost military colleges, The Citadel, in Charleston, South Carolina. It was there that a young Edwin Pollock first developed his natural abilities of leadership and discipline. In fact, he won the Star of the West Medal as the best-drilled cadet in 1920. He graduated the next year with a commission as a Second Lieutenant in the U.S. Army, and resigned this commission to accept an appointment as Second Lieutenant in the Marine Corps Reserve.

Edwin Pollock loved The Citadel, and held many fond memories of his experience there. This great institution, which has played an important role in building many military giants over the years, presented General Pollock with an honorary Doctor of Military Science degree in 1956. General Pollock was an active member of The Citadel Board of Visitors, and served as its Chairman from 1965 to 1968. After his term on the Board expired in 1974, he became the only person in Citadel history to be named Chairman Emeritus. He was also President of the Association of Citadel Men, President of the Beaufort Citadel Club, and a member of the Century Club. Recognizing his numerous contributions to his alma mater, the Beaufort Citadel Club established a Citadel scholarship in General Pollock's name.

General Pollock's superb Citadel training as a young man proved to be a valuable foundation upon which he built an extraordinary military career. It has been said that General Pollock attained one of the best combat records in Marine Corps history, and one need only observe his long list of accomplishments to realize that was certainly the case.

A veteran of five World War II campaigns, General Pollock saw action in Iwo Jima, where he received the Bronze Star with Combat "V"; Cape Gloucester (glow-ster), where he was awarded the Legion of Merit with Combat "V"; and the Guadalcanal-Tulagi (Tool-ah-gee) landings, where he earned the Navy Cross for heroism, General Pollock also fought in the Korean War, where he received the Distinguished Service Medal. In each of these confrontations, the U.S. Marines left an indelible mark of triumph, and General Pollock played a major role in these battles, exhibiting uncommon valor and courageous leadership.

General Pollock was credited for winning many victories off the battlefield as well. While serving as Director of Plans and Policies at Marine Corps Headquarters in Washington, D.C., General Pollock soundly defeated an effort by President Truman and others to dissolve the Marine's traditional amphibious mission and force-in-readiness role.

Today the Marines remain the proven masters of this form of combat, and stand ready to launch a swift and effective mission in any troubled area requiring this type of assistance.

General Pollock was a perfectionist in every way, particularly when it came to being physically and mentally prepared for military service. His own life typified the high ideals for which the Marines are famous, and he strove to ensure that the men who served under him exemplified that same caliber of performance. Throughout his entire military career, he possessed an innate ability to inspire leadership, commanding every conceivable size infantry, from a 44-man platoon to a 40,000-man force.

General Pollock also excelled in many administrative capacities. He was an able Director of the Marine Corps Education Center in Quantico, Virginia; and later became Commandant of the Marine Corps School there. In 1956, two years after assuming command of the Recruit Depot at Parris Island, General Pollock was selected to serve as Commanding General of the Pacific Fleet Marine Force—one of the most prestigious leadership positions in the armed forces. Eventually, he was transferred across the globe to serve as Commanding General of the Atlantic Fleet Marine Force, thus becoming the first officer in Marine Corps history to have ever commanded both of these strategic operations. After 38 illustrious years of military service, General Pollock and his lovely wife, Mary, retired in October of 1959, and settled in the serene and beautiful coastal community of Beaufort.

Who would have ever imagined that this, the son of an Augusta, Georgia, wholesale dry goods salesman, and grandson of a Confederate soldier, would become the great military and civic leader we honor today? We do not gather to merely pay tribute to his fine military career, nor to dedicate this boulevard for any one act of heroism. Instead, we are acknowledging General Pollock's lifetime of military and civilian accomplishments which have greatly contributed to the cause of human freedom and the quality of life in the Beaufort community.

General Pollock was a man of capacity, of courage, and compassion, whose uncompromising standard of excellence permeated every area of his life. His untimely death in November of 1982, at the age of 83, created a deep void in our lives, yet we take great comfort in remembering his service which touched the lives of thousands in this region and throughout the world.

Edwin A. Pollack was the complete man whose exemplary life was the result of his deep commitment to God, his strong love for America and burning zeal to defend its freedoms, his devotion to family, and his unquenchable desire to serve his fellow man. All of us are grateful for the enormous time and energy he spent in making Beaufort a better place to live and work, and we consider it an honor and privilege to have known this fine gentleman.

I am pleased to congratulate General Pollock's beloved daughter, Martha; his devoted son, E.A., Jr.; and six grandchildren and two great-grandchildren and other members of the Pollock family on this very special occasion. We are all proud to salute this soldier whose service to Beaufort, South Carolina, and America deserves this high honor.

Thank you again for inviting me to participate in the inauguration of the General Edwin A. Pollock Memorial and Causeway; and may God bless all of you.

CAUSEWAY DEDICATION HONORS FORMER "CG"

The Parris Island causeway will be dedicated the General Edwin A. Pollock Causeway at a ceremony on Horse Island Wednesday.

The commemoration, in honor of the late Gen. Pollock who served as commanding general of Parris Island from mid-1954 to December 1955, will be highlighted with an unveiling of a monument recognizing the general.

Honored guests attending the event will be the Pollock family; South Carolina Senator Strom Thurmond, keynote speaker; MGen. J.J. McMonagle, commanding general and Beaufort Mayor Henry C. Chambers.

The invocation and benediction will be given by Rev. Frank Sells, of the First Presbyterian Church of Beaufort.

Motorists traveling on the causeway between 10 and 11:30 a.m. should be prepared to stop. MGySgt. H.C. Dibiase, NCOIC of the Provost Marshal's Office says, "Motorists should avoid the causeway during the dedication if at all possible." He adds, "Traffic will be stopped for 15 minutes during the unveiling of the monument, therefore, travelers should make other plans."

POLLOCK "BRIDGES" BEAUFORT, DEPOT

"By the grateful and admiring citizens of Beaufort County, this stone has been raised to the memory of General E.A. Pollock, USMC. The causeway on which it rests and which bears his name symbolizes the link he forged between his service and his community . . . ."

These words are part of the inscription on the monument to be dedicated to Gen. Pollock by the citizens of Beaufort County Wednesday.

The general is described as being a "bridge" between the military installations and the civilian establishment, by retired LtCol. W.R. Von Harten, a member of the Gen. Pollock Memorial Committee. Von Harten calls Gen. Pollock a friend to all, whose first thought was always for others.

Prior to accepting his commission to second lieutenant in 1921, Gen. Pollock had an offer to play professional baseball but declined after he learned he had been granted a Marine commission. In a 1971 interview Gen. Pollock said, "I was tempted to accept the baseball offer, but I thought the Marine Corps' proposal was better."

After retiring from the Marine Corps in 1959, Pollock returned to the civilian community to work with various service organizations, the Citadel (a military academy in Charleston, S.C.), Beaufort County and the First Presbyterian Church of Beaufort.

A Citadel graduate, he was elected to the Board of Visitors of the Citadel in 1964. From 1965–1968 he served as Chairman of the Board at the Citadel, and when his final term expired in 1974 he was elected Chairman Emeritus, a title only he has held.

Before his death in 1982, he also served as President of the Association of Citadel Men, the Beaufort Citadel Club, and as a member of the Century Club. In 1963 he was awarded the Rotary Bowl for distinguished civic service to the Beaufort community and later was also appointed honory Deacon Emeritus by the First Presbyterian Church of Beaufort.

Although Pollock was held in esteem, he was characterized as a humble man. Rev. Frank Sells, chairman of the Gen. Pollock Memorial Committee says, "Many people tried to get the general to write an autobiography, but he would not respond. Many would go and sit with him, seeking to inquire into some of the great battles he had fought, and before they realized it he turned the conversation away from himself and showed his interest in the other person. He was a humble man who would not talk about himself."

The general is a highly decorated combat veteran. He is a recipient of the Navy Cross, the Legion of Merit, the Bronze Sar and the Distinguished Service Medal to name but a few.

As Director of Plans and Policies, at Headquarters Marine Corps, Pollock was credited with helping to preserve the Marines' established amphibious mission. He is also the only one to command both the Atlantic and Pacific Fleet Marine Forces. Gen. Pollock has served duty as director of the Marine Corps educational center in Quantico, and as a drill instructor at Marine Barracks, Parris Island.

[From the Beaufort (S.C.) Gazette, Apr. 17, 1984]

"THE GENERALS"—THEY SERVED IN PEACE, WAR

The nation's last famous World War II general died this morning. Gen. Mark Wayne Clark was 87.

Like his friend, the late Gen. Edwin A. Pollock of Beaufort, Gen. Clark will be mourned by a generation of men who served and fought with him in three wars.

Leaders from around the world have honored the two warriors who had much in common even though they served in different branches of military. A monument honoring Gen. Pollock will be unveiled at Parris Island Marine Recruit Depot Wednesday. Others will gather to honor Gen. Clark at noon Thursday.

The two elements that were greatest among their common bonds were the military and The Citadel, which Gen. Clark called, "a little oasis of honor, duty and enlightened discipline." Both men saw a great deal of Americanism in the school and the men who graduated from it. Gen. Clark served as president from 1954 until 1965. Gen. Pollock, a 1921 graduate of The Citadel, was chairman emeritus of the school's Board of Visitors at the time of his death.

GEN. MARK WAYNE CLARK

Mark Wayne Clark was one of the top U.S. Generals of World War II. During the Korean War, he became United Nations commander in Korea. In 1953, he signed the military armistice agreement that ended the Korean fighting.

Gen. Clark graduated from the U.S. Military Academy in 1917, and served in Europe during World War I. He commanded the U.S. Fifth Army in Italy from 1943 to 1944 and pushed the Germans out of the country. In 1945, he became commander in chief of the U.S. forces in Austria, and U.S. High Commissioners for Austria. In 1952, he became the United Nations commander in Korea and U.S. commander in the Far East. He signed the armistice that ended the Korean War.

Among the many decorations awarded Clark during his military career were the Distinguished Service Cross and the Distinguished Service Medal with three oak leaf clusters, the Honorary Knight Commander of the Most Excellent Order of the British Empire and the French Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor.

Clark retired from the Army in 1953. He wrote two accounts of his war experiences, Calculated Risk (1950) and From the Danube to the Yalu (1954.) However, the full exploits of Gen. Clark's 36-year military career may never be told.

GEN. EDWIN A. POLLOCK

Many people have cited him as having one of the most fabulous Marine combat records in the history of the Corps, but his admirers believe his remarkable story has never fully been told. They attributed this to his modesty which restrained him from revealing his own heroics from Guadalcanal to Korea. His citation for the Navy Cross earned for heroics as a battalion commander with the 1st Marines, 1st Marine Division during the battle of the Tenaru River on Guadalcanal told a portion of the story.

Gen. Pollock was a veteran of five World War II campaigns and the Korean War. He was the only officer ever to have commanded fleet Marine forces in both the Pacific and the Atlantic. And, he was once nominated by the S.C. General Assembly to the Secretary of the Navy to become the commandant of the Marine Corps.

They were the last great generals of the last great war this country fought. But they were more than that. Having known the destruction and suffering caused by war, they were humanitarians. They served their country well in peace, as well as war.

ANOTHER WEEK OF BIG SPENDING

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. KILDEE). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, we are about to complete a very interesting day in which we had a series of votes where finally the American taxpayer won a couple of minor victories. A little bit of money was saved. They were not a very large victories. They were a matter of a few million dollars. And compared to the budget as a whole, those are fairly minor victories, but it was a victory in terms of trying to keep the spending for one agency within the budget the President proposed, a budget that was $175 billion in deficits, and Congress was about to exceed that amount of money by even more.

But today on the House floor, through a series of votes, through some rather complicated parliamentary maneuvering, we were able, in the end, to bring about a small victory for the American people and try to keep that agency within its Presidentially requested sums of money.

And what happened? After all of that maneuvering and after the American people had won a little bit of a victory, the House was gagged. Instead of going to a final resolution of the issue, we resorted to gagging the House, rising, moving out before we could pass such a bill in final form.

Once again we see what happens in the House of Representatives when the tyranny of the majority steps out of line with the American people. The American people want to make doggone certain that this Congress begins to handle deficits, that we get rid of multibillion-dollar deficits. The American people understand that something has gone drastically wrong in this Congress, and today they have an example of it. When the people win a little bit of a victory, when a little bit of money is saved, what happens? The House rises before we can have final passage. And I will bet you that when that bill comes back here a little later on, we are going to find that a lot of arms have been twisted and a lot of work has been done in order to reverse some of those victories that were won on the floor today.

This was not just rising to leave for the week. This was rising in order to make doggone certain that by the time we go to final passage the American people will lose, not win, and we will go back to spending levels irresponsible and unconscionable.

I think that this is a week that the American people ought to focus on; this is a day the American people ought to focus on. Yesterday we had a similar bill on the floor, a bill for the National Science Foundation. It has many, many meritorious programs. The National Science Foundation is one of those agencies that has also had some programs that have not been too meritorious in the past, and we raised on the House floor the issue of whether or not we ought to be spending more money, adding to deficits for programs like studying the social ecology of far-ranging coyotes, and other things that we were appropriating money to do. And the House voted yes, indeed, let us spend an extra $58 million, bust the budget to the tune of $58 million, to do some of those kinds of things yesterday.

And today, when the American people did win a bit of a victory, the House could not stand to move forward and bring that victory to final resolution. Instead, we rose and went for another day. On another day the chances are that the American people may lose. There ought to be some focus on that. We ought to make it clear that this House has no intention whatsoever of dealing responsibly with the issue of our time, the budget issue. This House is continuing its big spending ways. This House is continuing to ignore what the American people know, and that is that you have to live within a budget. This week proves it. The American people should take a close look at how their Representative voted in a week of big spending.

INTRODUCTION OF THE KEMP-KASTEN "FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX" (FAST)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, today, together with many of my colleagues in the House, I am introducing a tax reform bill called the fair and simple tax (FAST). Senator BOB KASTEN of Wisconsin is intoducing a companion bill today in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, our current income tax code is now too complex, too encrusted with special provisions, and its tax rates are too high, to be either fair or efficient in raising revenues. There are over 5,100 pages in the Internal Revenue Code, and about 10,000 pages of IRS interpretations to that code. The House has just adopted a measure called the Tax Simplification Act which runs over 1,000 pages. The explanation of this supposed "simplification" runs to three volumes of over 1,000 pages each.

Many provisions which were intended to protect families, like the personal exemption, have been eaten away by years of inflation. The same is true of provisions for those with low incomes, such as the zero bracket amount.

The fair and simple tax (FAST) is designed to bring about a simpler, fairer, and more efficient Tax Code, with greater after-tax incentives for work, saving and investment.

I am pleased to announce as original sponsors of this legislation TRENT LOTT, HENSON MOORE, HENRY HYDE, JOHN HILER, DENNY SMITH, G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST, RON PACKARD, DON RITTER, NEWT GINGRICH, DAN COATS, VIN WEBER, CONNIE MACK, DAN LUNGREN, ROBERT WALKER, BARBARA VUCANOVICH, JUDD GREGG, THOMAS KINDNESS, ED BETHUNE, MARK SILJANDER, JIM COURTER, DAVID DREIER, BOB MCEWEN, HAL DAUB, BILL LOWERY, BILL DANNEMEYER, LARRY CRAIG, DAN BURTON, BILL MCCOLLUM, BOB LIVINGSTON, TOM HARTNETT, HANK BROWN, and DAN SCHAEFER.

Mr. Speaker, this tax bill is fair to everyone. But it is especially fair to families with children, to the poor, to working men and women, to homeowners and givers to charity, and to those who face discouragingly high tax rates. It is also fair to taxpayers who now spend countless wasted hours, trying to figure out an unnecessarily complicated Tax Code.

In general, the FAST plan broadens the tax base by eliminating most tax preferences or "loopholes." However, important deductions are retained for interest (including mortgages), charitable contributions, real property taxes and catastrophic medical expenses. Also retained are the current tax treatment of IRA's, Keoghs, social security, and veterans' benefits. After deducting generous personal allowances and a new employment income exclusion, all taxable income is taxed at the same 25 percent tax rate.

FAST is simple enough that most itemizers could use a tax form shorter than today's 1040A "short form" for nonitemizers. And taxpayers will not even need to look up their tax in a tax table, because there is only one tax rate.

Our new proposal is fair to families with children. It is fair to lower and middle income taxpayers. FAST doubles the personal exemption for each taxpayer, spouse, and dependent to $2,000, and increases the zero bracket amounts, or standard deductions. There is also a new exclusion for employment income to protect wage and salary earners. The exclusion is generally 20 percent of employment income up to about $40,000, and is phased out entirely at about $100,000. This new exclusion lowers the effective income tax rate and offsets the social security payroll tax, resulting in a smooth, almost flat total tax rate.

As a result of these generous allowances, Americans near or below the poverty level would no longer pay income tax under FAST. For example, the income at which people start paying income tax would rise from $3,445 to $5,875 for a single taxpayer, and from $8,936 to $14,375 for a family of four. This lifts the income tax threshold above the poverty line, which is $5,517 for a single person and $11,101 for a family of four. More than 1 million of the lowest income taxpayers are removed from the tax rolls. And FAST helps millions more to get out of the "poverty trap" of steep disincentives caused by a combination of high tax rates and means-tested social welfare payments.

For taxpayers in general, the FAST tax is designed to raise about the same amount of revenue in each income class as under current law. However, because many tax preferences are eliminated, many taxpayers whose deductions are no greater than average would receive a tax cut. For example, a nonitemizing family of four earning $20,000 would receive a tax cut of $616.

FAST increases incentives, too. Today's top income tax rate is cut in half, from 50 to 25 percent. This increases after-tax incentives by up to one-half. The Tax Code is indexed, to protect everyone from future tax increases caused by inflation. For the first time, capital gains are indexed for inflation, to end the taxation of phony, inflated "gains" on assets like stocks or houses.

On the corporate side, most tax preferences are repealed, and the tax rate cut from 46 to 30 percent, with a reduced 15 percent rate for small businesses. The new depreciation schedules enacted in 1981 are retained, and the corporate capital gains tax is reduced. An expensing provision for small business is also retained.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I do not claim that this bill is the last word in tax policy. If we can find ways to improve upon it, either on the individual or corporate side, we will. Rather, it is a first word, a way to restart debate in the Congress on proper tax policy. It is a way to focus the energies of the movement for fairer, simpler, more incentive-oriented tax reform which has been growing in this country for more than a decade.

With its simplicity, protection for families and the poor, and increased incentives to work, save and invest, the fair and simple tax is a plan which families across the country can embrace. I urge my colleagues in both parties to join me in enacting it.

What follows is a more detailed description of the plan and several key features.

THE KEMP-KASTEN "FAIR AND SIMPLE TAX": GENERAL DESCRIPTION

INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX

Reduced rate of 25 percent applies to following tax base:

Eliminate most deductions, credits, exemptions, exclusions except personal allowances: personal exemption doubled to $2,000, zero-bracket amounts (standard deduction) increased to $2,700 single/head of household, $3,500 joint.

Special exclusion for wage-earners: 20 percent deduction of wage/salary income up to Social Security wage base (about $40,000 in 1985); phased out so that no exclusion is allowed on incomes above about $100,000; if a taxpayer's earned income is less than $10,000, all gross income below $10,000 is considered earned income.

Deductions retained: Charitable contributions; mortgage and other interest paid; real property taxes; and medical expenses above 10 percent of adjusted gross income.

Indexing for inflation: Personal exemption, zero bracket amounts, capital basis.

Capital gains treatment: Full taxation of gains, full deduction of loss, with basis indexed from enactment date; taxpayer option during 10-year transition period: 25% exclusion (18.75% rate), without indexing; and current homeowner's rollover and one-time exclusion retained.

Current treatment retained: Retirement annuities (IRA's, Keoghs, Social Security, etc.); military and veterans benefits; employer-provided benefits; foreign source income; earned income credit (slightly modified); nonprofit tax exempt bonds; employee business expenses; and moving expenses.

CORPORATE INCOME TAX

Reduced rate of 30% applied to the following tax base:

Eliminate most deductions, credits, exemptions, exclusions except deductions above if applicable, e.g., charitable contributions; ordinary business expenses; and current-law capital cost recovery schedules (ARCS or 15-5-3).

Small business provisions: 15% tax rate up to $50,000 taxable income and, expensing for up to $10,000 of business property.

Capital gains tax rate cut from 28% to 20%.

Foreign income tax credit.

AN OVERVIEW

The Fair and Simple Tax (FAST) is a tax reform bill authorized by Congressman Jack Kemp (R-NY) and Senator Bob Kasten (R-WI). It is designed to increase the fairness, simplicity, and economic incentives of the current tax system, while raising almost the same amount of revenue.

In general, the FAST tax further increases incentives while broadening the tax base and protecting those at the bottom of the income scale.

FAST is simple. Most tax preferences are removed, permitting a lower tax rate on a broader tax base. A few important deductions are retained, such as interest (including mortgage interest), real property taxes, charitable contributions, and retirement plans (IRA's, Keoghs, Social Security, company pensions, etc.) After deducting generous personal allowances, and an exclusion for employment income, everyone pays the same 25% income tax rate.

FAST is fast. Because of its simplicity, most itemizers could use a tax form shorter than today's 1040A "short form." Taxpayers would not need to use a tax table to figure out what they owe.

FAST is fair. It provides generous personal allowances which protect those with low incomes. The "zero bracket amounts," or standard deductions, are increased to $2,700 for single taxpayers and $3,500 for joint returns. The personal exemption for each taxpayer, spouse, and dependent is doubled to $2,000. This is designed to make up for a decade of erosion of the exemption due to inflation. This means the FAST is fair to families with children.

FAST is fair to the poor and the working poor. Because of the increased personal allowances and the employment income exclusion, a single person would not pay income tax on the first $5,875 of income in 1985 (compared with $3,445 under current law). A working family of four would not pay tax on the first $14,375 of income (compared with $8,936 under current law). The poverty level for 1985 is estimated to be $5,517 for a single person and $11,101 for a family of four. Thus, single taxpayers below the poverty level, and families below about 130% of the poverty level, would no longer pay federal income tax. More than a million of the lowest-income taxpayers would be removed from the tax rolls.

FAST indexes the tax code for inflation, including the personal exemption, the zero-bracket amounts (standard deductions), and employment income exclusion. This prevents automatic tax increases caused by inflation, which hit lower and middle incomes the hardest. The poor and working poor would be permanently protected from inflation. For the first time, capital gains are indexed for inflation, preventing taxation of phony, inflated gains on assets like houses and stocks.

The FAST tax gives special protection for wage-earners. Wage-earners' incomes are subject to risks of health and age note faced by those who receive income from securities and from physical capital: a bond can't get sick, and a human being doesn't receive depreciation allowances. FAST provides an employment income exclusion, which permits taxpayers to exclude 20% of their wages and salaries from taxation, up to about $40,000. (The exclusion is phased out above $40,000, disappearing entirely for incomes larger than about $100,000). If a taxpayer's employment income is less than $10,000, all gross income below $10,000 qualifies for the exclusion.

The employment income exclusion is tied to the Social Security wage base. This has several advantages: First, it removes big discontinuities in the combined Social Security and income tax rates. (However, this in no way constitutes "back door" financing of Social Security with general revenues, because the link between contributions and benefits stays the same. The fiscal integrity of the Social Security system is unaffected.) Second, it results in total marginal tax rates which are about the same for both employment and saving income. Third, this feature avoids a redistribution of the tax burden. Other flat tax proposals, if they raise the same amount of revenue as current law, necessarily shift the tax burden to lower and/or middle-income taxpayers.

The overall distribution of the federal tax burden is little changed from current law—with and without the Social Security tax. In each income class up to about $100,000, the amount of revenue raised is estimated to be about the same as under current law. In fact, there are small tax reductions on average for taxpayers below $20,000. Over $100,000 ignoring incentive effects from tax-cutting, there would be modest revenue losses. Including incentive effects, revenue would be about the same, or slightly higher, than under current law. For example, when the top income tax rate was cut from 70% to 50% in 1982, revenue increased by 13% among taxpayers earning more than $100,000 a year.

Since many tax preferences are eliminated, yet the tax paid in each income class is little changed, many taxpayers with average deductions or less would receive a tax cut. For example, a family of four earning $20,000 and taking the standard deduction would receive a $616 tax cut.

FAST increases incentives. The marginal tax rate of 25% is only half of the current tax law's top 50% tax rate. That creates after-tax incentives for work, saving, investment and business enterprise which are up to one-half larger than under current law. The treatment of capital gains is mostly more generous than under current law: capital gains are indexed for inflation; gains are fully taxable, but losses are fully deductible. During a ten-year transition period, taxpayers may choose to exclude 25% of gains, without indexing, if this treatment is more favorable. This lowers the top tax rate on capital gains from 20% to 18.75%. Current tax benefits for IRA's, Social Security, and other retirement pensions are retained.

On the corporate side, most tax preferences and credits are eliminated. The corporate tax rate is cut from 46% to 30%. But the current capital cost recovery (depreciation) schedules, enacted in 1981, are retained. Small business benefits from a lower 15% tax rate up to $50,000, and by keeping the ability to expense up to $10,000 of business investment per year. Also, the business capital gains tax is cut from 28% to 20%. The foreign income tax credit is retained.

TREATMENT OF TAXPAYERS BELOW OR NEAR THE POVERTY LEVEL

Under current law, many taxpayers living below the poverty level pay federal income taxes. Under the Kemp-Kasten "Fair and Simple Tax" (FAST), however, no working family or single taxpayer below the poverty line would pay any federal income tax.

FAST also extends similar protection to "the working poor"—families with incomes of up to about 130% of the poverty level. In this way, about a million and a half taxpayers near or below the poverty level would be removed from the tax rolls entirely.

This is because three features of the FAST proposal combine to increase the income threshold at which taxpayers begin to pay Federal income tax: the doubled personal exemption, the increased zero bracket amounts (standard deductions), and the new exclusion for employment income.

What is just as important, the FAST plan makes sure that this protection will always exist in the future. Under FAST, the personal exemption, the zero bracket amounts, and the employment income exclusion are all indexed to keep up with inflation.

SUMMARY OF EFFECTS OF THE EMPLOYMENT INCOME EXCLUSION

A distinctive feature of the Kemp-Kasten "Fair and Simple Tax" (FAST) is a new "up-front" or "above-the-line" exclusion for part of wages and salaries: the employment income exclusion.

In general, taxpayers may exclude 20 percent of wage and salary income, up to the Social Security wage base (which is $39,300 in 1985, and indexed by law). Above that point, the maximum exclusion is reduced by 12.5 percent of a taxpayer's wages and salaries in excess of the Social Security wage base. For 1985, this results in a zero exclusion for all incomes larger than $102,180.

Two exceptions are permitted for the sake of fairness. First, taxpayers with less than $10,000 in wages and salaries may exclude 20 percent of all gross income, up to $10,000. This especially helps retired senior citizens. Second, two-earner couples with combined wages and salaries in excess of the Social Security wage base may figure their exclusions separately and add the two.

This provision has several advantages:

First, it protects the poorest individuals and families, by raising the threshold at which they start paying income tax. For example, under Kemp-Kasten the personal exemptions and standard deduction allowed for a family of four total $11,500. The wage exclusion raises the tax-free level of income further, to $14,375. (The income tax threshold is less than $9,000 under current law; the official poverty level will be more than $11,000 in 1985.)

Second, for middle-income taxpayers, the exclusion offsets most of the Social Security payroll tax rate. Without such a provision, a flat income tax rate would result in significantly higher combined marginal tax rates (Social Security plus income tax) below the Social Security wage base than above it. The FAST plan fixes the problem. (The marginal tax rate is the tax on an additional dollar of income.)

Third, the exclusion results in smooth, virtually flat total marginal tax rates both below and above the Social Security wage base. It keeps the tax rates on employment and savings income about the same above the income tax threshold. And compared with a "pure" flat income tax, the exclusion reduces the tax burden for all wages and salaries less than about $100,000. Incomes larger than about $100,000 receive no benefit from the exclusion.

Finally, the employment income exclusion helps keep the distribution of the income tax burden virtually unchanged in each income class, right up to the point at which the exclusion disappears. This makes FAST fairer than a straight flat rate tax, while remaining almost as simple.

COMPARISON WITH THE BRADLEY-GEPHARDT TAX BILL

Many people have asked how FAST compares with the Bradley-Gephardt bill, which is among the better-known proposals for tax reform.

The two proposals are broadly similar in many important respects. Both bills are designed to broaden the existing tax base, to simplify the tax code and permit significantly lower marginal tax rates. Both are designed to raise roughly the same amount of revenue as under current law in 1985. Both are designed to maintain the distribution of the income tax burden roughly the same as under current law.

However, the two plans also differ in significant ways. FAST would seem to be somewhat simpler, to provide more incentives for saving and investment, and to be fairer over time because, unlike Bradley-Gephardt, it indexes the tax code for inflation.

SIMPLICITY

Under FAST all taxpayers pay the same tax rate (except for the effect of an employment income exclusion). Taxpayers can figure out how much they owe without referring to a tax table.

Bradley-Gephardt retains three progressive tax rates, which consist of one "normal" and two "surtax" rates. A tax table is necessary. Also, under Bradley-Gephardt, sometimes the effect of deductions depends on adjusted gross income, and sometimes on taxable income. This could result in forcing taxpayers, in effect, to figure out their taxes twice.

While Bradley-Gephardt retains some of the existing deductions, most of them apply only to the "normal" tax rate, not the "surtax" rates. For example, a homeowner in the 26 percent tax bracket would find that his deduction for mortgage interest payments is worth only about half of the tax saving allowed in the same circumstances under current law. Under FAST, what you see is what you get: if a deduction is allowed, it is allowed in full, not in part.

Under FAST, the personal exemption is $2,000 for everyone. Under Bradley-Gephardt, the personal exemption is one amount ($1,600) for adults and a smaller amount ($1,000) for dependent children; like the deductions, these exemptions apply only to the "normal," not the "surtax" rates. Under FAST, the personal exemption is $2,000 for everyone, without restriction.

INCENTIVES

FAST's tax rate of 25 percent is lower than Bradley-Gephardt's 30 percent top tax rate. Bradley-Gephardt raises the capital gains tax rate on individuals from 20 percent to 30 percent. On a comparable basis, FAST lowers it to 18.75 percent for individuals. Bradley-Gephardt's limitations on deductions for interest also penalize those who invest for long-term capital gains, since up-front costs cannot be deducted. Bradley-Gephardt increases the taxation of corporate-run retirement pensions; FAST does not.

FAST institutes a new exclusion for employment income, equal to one-fifth of wages and salaries up to about $40,000, which is phased out from $40,000 to $100,000. The exclusion increases the income tax threshold, offsets the Social Security payroll tax, and results in a virtually flat combined income and payroll tax rate. Bradley-Gephardt does not have such a provision.

FAIRNESS

FAST indexes the tax code for inflation, including the low-income allowances. Bradley-Gephardt repeals indexing and thus ensures both "bracket creep" and erosion of the standard deduction and personal exemption by inflation. Thus, with any inflation, Bradley-Gephardt would result over time in tax increases which shift the tax burden in real terms to the middle and lower income taxpayers. FAST extends indexing for the first time to capital gains, ending the taxation of paper "gains" which may actually be losses after inflation. Bradley-Gephardt's higher tax rate is applied to inflated, not inflation-adjusted, gains.

FAST contains somewhat more relief for the poor and working poor than Bradley-Gephardt. Under FAST, the threshold at which a single taxpayer begins paying income tax is $5,875 (compared with $4,600 under Bradley-Gephardt). For a working family of four, the income tax threshold under FAST is $14,375 (compared with $11,200 under Bradley-Gephardt). The poverty line in 1985 is estimated to be $5,517 for single people, and $11,101 for a family of four. Because FAST is indexed for inflation, it would always protect the poor from future inflation.

ALLOWABLE DEDUCTIONS AND PREFERENCES

Both plans allow deductions for charitable contributions, mortgage interest, property taxes, and medical expenses in excess of 10 percent of adjusted gross income. However, as mentioned, under Bradley-Gephardt these apply only to the 14 percent "normal" tax rate, not the additional 12 percent and 16 percent "surtax" rates; under FAST there is no restriction. FAST permits the deduction of all interest, including mortgage interest. Bradley-Gephardt permits the deduction of interest other than home mortgage interest only to the extent that it does not exceed investment income. Bradley-Gephardt permits a deduction for state and local income taxes; FAST does not. Bradley-Gephardt taxes employees for the value of employer-contributed life and health insurance premiums in addition to compensation actually received; FAST does not.

BUSINESS TAXATION

Both FAST and Bradley-Gephardt eliminate most tax preferences, including the investment tax credit, and lower the corporate tax rate from a maximum 46 percent to 30 percent. FAST lowers the business capital gains tax rate from 28 percent to 20 percent, with indexing; Bradley-Gephardt raises it to 30 percent, without indexing.

However, FAST retains the 1981 capital cost recovery schedules, while Bradley-Gephardt institutes a less generous and more complicated system, which approximates the pre-1981 depreciation schedules. The FAST system is closer to economic neutrality, and so provides more incentives for capital investment.

Bradley-Gephardt changes the treatment of foreign-source income in ways which put U.S. firms and employees at a disadvantage; FAST retains the more generous current law.

FAST retains two special provisions for small business: a reduced 15 percent tax rate on the first $50,000 of income, and the ability to expense up to $10,000 per year of business property. Bradley-Gephardt eliminates both the lower tax rates for small business and the expensing provision.

Aside from these differences, the two proposals are broadly similar.●

NATIONAL LIBRARY WEEK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. GREEN) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I join my respected colleague, Mr. OWENS, in paying tribute to National Library Week, which as you know was celebrated the week of April 9.

Libraries are an integral part of our society. They provide valuable information to people of all ages. Adults and children alike can find endless instruction and amusement in our Nations libraries. Print collections and tapes help to entertain the elderly and the handicapped. For the young, libraries offer new worlds and encourage adventure and fantasy.

Libraries, these days, are doing much more for people than ever before. The New York Public Library, for example, offers a variety of programs to benefit the community. Literacy, job and community information centers, English-as-a-second-language classes and a whole range of services for the handicapped are just a few of the exciting projects that the New York Public Library is sponsoring to educate and enlighten New Yorkers.

Libraries are an important resource, critical to the continuation of a free society. Only by guaranteeing the public free access to information about the world we live in can we be promote the high ideals of freedom and liberty that we cherish. National Library Week will focus awareness on this vital national resource, and insure that more people than ever before will benefit from exposure to our libraries.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, on April 12, 1984, I was present in the Chamber and voted in favor of House Concurrent Resolution 290, the resolution passed by the House protesting the mining of the Nicaraguan harbors. On rollcall No. 89, the motion to recommit and kill the resolution, I am recorded voting "no." Yet, on the tally for rollcall No. 90, which occurred 5 minutes after the vote on the recommittal motion, I am not recorded, even though I was present and voting. I would like the record to show that, despite the apparent malfunction of the voting equipment, I supported passage of the sense-of-Congress resolution opposing the use of funds for the purpose of mining the territorial waters or ports of Nicaragua.●

NATIONAL NURSING HOME RESIDENTS' DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a joint resolution designating April 27, 1984, as "National Nursing Home Residents' Day." I am pleased to say that the majority of the House joins me in support of this measure to honor a most significant and often forgotten group within the senior citizen population. The distinguished Senator from Arkansas, DAVID PRYOR, has introduced an identical resolution in the other body.

This is the fifth year I have sponsored this resolution which is designed to focus attention on the achievements of the over 1 million Americans living in nursing homes today. My colleagues join me in letting these people know that we care about them and are grateful for their substantial contribution to the growth and development of this Nation. They played and continue to play a vital role in our society.

Many of those residing in nursing homes are there not because they require the level of care only provided in nursing homes. Often it is because they are without family to care for them, or without the necessary community services that would allow them to remain independent.

Numerous nursing home residents have lived in relative isolation in our cities and towns. Through major cooperative efforts, we can turn this situation around and actively integrate these citizens into the communities through a broad range of activities aimed at recognizing resident concern, accomplishments, and community involvement. We hope that this joint resolution will go one step further in making this integration possible.

I would like to recognize my distinguished colleague MARIO BIAGGI for his extended contributions in making this resolution possible, as well as the efforts of the National Coalition for Nursing Home Reform.

I submit for the RECORD a copy of the resolution.

H.J. RES. 457

Whereas over one million older Americans reside in nursing homes and one in five older Americans likely will reside in a nursing home at some time;

Whereas nursing home residents have contributed to the growth, development, and progress of this Nation and, as elders, offer a wealth of knowledge and experience;

Whereas Congress recognizes the importance of the continued participation of these institutionalized senior citizens in the life of our Nation;

Whereas in an effort to foster reintegration of these citizens into their communities Congress encourages community recognition of and involvement in the lives of nursing home residents;

Whereas the Congress recognizes the importance of safeguarding the rights of nursing home residents; and

Whereas it is appropriate for the American people to join in support of nursing home residents to demonstrate their concern and respect for these citizens: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That April 27, 1984, is designated as "National Nursing Home Residents Day", a time of renewed recognition, concern, and respect for the Nation's nursing home residents. The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe this day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO AUTHORIZE THE CORPORATION FOR PUBLIC BROADCASTING

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, today 10 of my colleagues and I are introducing legislation to authorize funds for this Nation's excellent public broadcasting system.

The legislation authorizes funds for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting for fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989 and for the public telecommunications facilities program (PTFP), administered by the Department of Commerce, for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987. Additionally, the legislation repeals the so-called unrelated business income tax penalty which is a clear disincentive to stations developing alternative revenue sources.

The bill also eliminates the requirement that a strict 75 percent of PTFP funding be used for unserved areas of the country, although bringing service to unserved areas of the country will remain a priority of the program. For the convenience of my colleagues, the following is a section-by-section analysis of the bill.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

I. SHORT TITLE

Section 1 entitles the bill the "Public Broadcasting Amendments Act of 1984."

II. PUBLIC TELECOMMUNICATIONS FACILITIES PROGRAM

Section 2 authorizes appropriations for the PTFP at $50 million for FY 1985, $53 million for FY 1986, and $56 million for FY 1987.

The Public Telecommunications Facilities Program, administered by the National Telecommunications and Information Administration of the Department of Commerce, provides matching grants for planning and construction of additional public broadcasting facilities so that the benefits of our nation's public broadcasting system can reach more Americans. The Administration, as it has done every year since 1981, has proposed abolishing the program by requesting no funds for it. The Administration justification for eliminating the PTFP is that it has met its goals of bringing public television and radio to all Americans. In 1981 Congress enacted a gradual reduction in the authorization levels for the PTFP from $20 million in FY 1982 to $15 million in FY 1983 to $12 million in FY 1984. This compares to a $40 million authorization level for this program in 1981.

Currently, however, 30% of the country cannot receive public radio signals, and 10% of the public still cannot receive a local public television signal. Many large geographic areas, particularly in the West, cannot receive a public television signal. There is no local service yet in Montana, 15% of Missourians do not receive public television signals, and similar problems exist in Nevada, Arizona, Alaska and Hawaii. In other areas there are particular problems where mountains and buildings interfere with signals, and equipment is needed to correct this situation in order to serve the entire community. Finally, a severe problem is developing with respect to preservation and maintenance of existing transmission and other broadcasting equipment, and it has become very clear that updating and replacing equipment and parts requires an ongoing commitment of resources if quality public broadcasting signals are going to be available to the public.

The FY 1984 appropriation for the PTFP was only $11.88 million. However, last year's 324 grant applications requested a combined total of $72 million in funds, backed by an impressive commitment of nearly $30 million in local funds. Thus, only 14% of the applications could be granted.

In order to bring PTFP funding more in line with the demonstrated need for the program, the public broadcasting community has requested an authorization of $50 million, $53 million and $56 million for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987 respectively. This legislation adopts this level of funding. Additionally, S. 2436, introduced by Senator Goldwater, was recently reported from the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee and adopts this level of funding for PTFP.

III. CPB FUNDING

Section 3 of the legislation authorizes funding for CPB for FY 1987, 1988, and 1989 at $238 million, $253 million and $270 million respectively.

In 1981, as part of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act, Congress enacted substantial funding cuts for CPB from an authorization of $220 million in fiscal year 1983 to $130 million in each of fiscal years 1984, 1985 and 1986. It was hoped at the time that new sources of revenue, provided for in part by that Act, could be generated to compensate for decreasing federal funds. However, since that time, revenue has not been generated quickly enough and in sufficient amounts to compensate for these drastic cuts. As a result, many stations have had to reduce the amount of locally produced programming, overall broadcast hours and staff. Moreover, important cultural and educational series are being forced out of production. For example, the series "Nature: Living Wild" and "Latenight America" have been cancelled due to lack of funding. Production of new shows for "Great Performances", "Frontline" and "Playhouse" have been scaled back 20%. Production for "Wonderworks" and "Reading Rainbow", both popular and critically acclaimed programs for children, has been cut 50% and 33% respectively. Moreover, two-thirds of all "Sesame Street" programs are now reruns of previous segments.

In order to prevent further erosion of the public broadcasting system and to begin to stem curtailment of services, Congress recently passed a supplemental authorization (P.L. 98-214) which provides a minimal cost-of-living adjustment of 5.6% for fiscal year 1984, 1985 and 1986 to cover inflation, increased costs and growth in the number of public broadcast stations. Under this law, authorizations increased to $145 million, $153 million and $162 million respectively. As the minimum amount of federal funding necessary to restore the level of programming and services provided by the public broadcasting service before the huge cuts the Corporation for Public Broadcasting has requested $238 million for FY 1987, $253 million for FY 1988 and $270 million for FY 1989. This legislation and the Senate bill adopt those levels.

It should be noted that the bipartisan Temporary Commission on Alternative Financing For Public Telecommunications (TCAF) recently reported to Congress that there was no forseeable or rational replacement for Federal funding support at higher levels than exist today.

IV. CRITERIA FOR APPROVAL AND EXPENDITURES BY THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

Section 4 of this legislation strikes section 393(c) of the Communications Act of 1934 which in effect removes the stipulation that 75% of PTFP funds must go toward new service.

Because a large proportion of the country is now served by public television and radio, it is no longer necessary for a strict 75% of all facilities funds to be directed to this effort. In fact, much of the equipment now used by public broadcasters is very old and must be replaced, or updated. The elimination of this stipulation will allow more funds to be directed to upgrading and replacement of equipment, which has become a critical need. However, the directive that unserved areas be funded on a priority basis would continue in place.

S. 2436 also contains this amendment.

V. REPEAL OF THE UNRELATED INCOME TAX PENALTY

Section 5 deletes Section 396(k)(8) of the Communications Act of 1934 and repeals the unrelated income tax penalty.

The Temporary Commission on Alternative Financing reviewed the possibility that additional sources of income could be generated by public broadcasters entering auxiliary commercial ventures. For example, some public television stations use spare production capacity to produce programs for cable television, another leases its satellite uplink for commercial purposes. Some public radio stations have signed agreements to lease excess satellite distribution capacity for commercial paging ventures. TCAF concluded, however, that profits from these ventures are extremely small, and prospects for them to generate meaningful income in the foreseeable future appear dim.

TCAF did conclude however, that Section 396(k)(8) of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1981 is a barrier to increased entrepreneurial activities by public broadcasters. That section now requires that public broadcasters paying taxes on income earned from unrelated activities must refund to CPB an amount equal to the tax paid. Public broadcasters believe that this "double taxes" stations that earn unrelated business income, and urge that this provision be repealed. This legislation repeals the provision.

I urge my colleages to join me in cosponsoring this important legislation.●

WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a resolution invoking the War Powers Resolution with respect to Central America. I would like to point out that the RECORD will reflect that I did the same thing last year, exactly 1 year ago, with respect to Lebanon and Beirut. I am hopeful there will be more heedful years in this case because here the stakes are immensely large.

For, at this point the policy or nonpolicy of this country, our country, is committing our children and our children's children and their children to an endless era of hostility and war between ourselves and these children and those that destiny and God has placed as our neighbors to share what we call the new world.

So today I am introducing this resolution even though I have spoken out on this particular need for months. I am doing this because now there can be no longer any doubt that the administration is following a course that is bound to lead America into an involvement, in a conflict, as I say, in Central America and other parts of the world, that irretrievably condemns our children, future generations, to a situation reminiscent of what has occurred in Europe, where ancient hatreds still boil over.

Honduras, for example, has been transformed by our occupation, for indeed, we are occupying Honduras and have so for quite some time. We have transformed the poorest nation in Central America into a strategic bastion through the guise of continual military maneuvers. We are involved in a clandestine war against Nicaragua. The number of Americans in El Salvador is much greater than has been officially represented, and I have been reporting this for more than 2½ years, thanks to imaginative ways of counting advisers.

Furthermore, Americans have been involved in combat support operations in El Salvador. Through the provisions of aerial reconnaissance, we have been using the same tactics where we have complete control of the air as we did in Vietnam. I think we are forgetting all of that. We are using the same tactics, and I have reports, and have had for more than 2 years of the same terror that we are spreading.

We are, as some editorialists have called us in Latin America, the terrorists, the Nazis of the region. We have been involved in combat support operations in El Salvador and elsewhere, through the provisions, as I said, of these particular maneuvers. The involvement is so intense that American advisers in El Salvador alone have been the target of assassination; have come under fire repeatedly because of the close involvement with active military units.

During the past few weeks the House has been continually shocked by reports coming from Central America. We have discovered by simply picking up the morning newspaper that the Central Intelligence Agency directly supervised the mining of three Nicaraguan harbors. I had reported for a year that the CIA had been actively engaged in attempting to assassinate the leaders of the Nicaraguan Provisional Government; was weekly attempting to blow up their public buildings; their docking facilities; their wharves; their refineries. Finally it could not be denied any longer just about a month ago.

We know that the CIA oversaw the sabotage of Nicaraguan oil tankers; that U.S. reconnaissance flights have aided the Salvadoran military in tracking down guerrilla units, so-called guerrilla units; that the United States is establishing a semipermanent military presence in Honduras. Apparently the Reagan administration is operating under the philosophy of what the Congress does not know or will not know will not hurt them. Yet, when the Reagan policy does fail, it is a calculated course of disaster, so it is inevitable that it will fail just like the Lebanon, the Beirut disaster.

Some of us talked for almost 2 years on that; we were not prophets, we were not seers; we were merely pointing out what such experts like the Joint Chiefs of Staff unanimously had indicated to the President. The Joint Chiefs of Staff had been strongly against the deployment of the marines in Beirut. All I was saying was the reasons why militarily there was no role but death for those marines. Yet, it was ignored. Even after 240 were murdered in their beds, the President did not change; he persisted until it was absolutely obvious that our allies, so-called, French and Italian were going to withdraw theirs if we did not.

This is the fact that is the truth. But even then, the basic policy was destructive; catastrophic; and the so-called actions, because I do not know that there is a policy, is fated for utter failure, catastrophic in meaning and in eventual significance to our great country.

Yet, when it does, it will be the Congress that will be to blame as the President tried to blame Beirut, the withdrawal of the marines, and of course, was ridiculed not only in our country, but everywhere else, because it was obvious that what he was saying was that those critics, like myself, that had said that this is the obvious ending of this bad policy were to blame for his bad policy. It reminded me of what George E. Reedy, who had been a special assistant to President Johnson and a man whom I have had the honor of knowing, wrote, in one of the books that he published on the Presidency, and I am quoting:

> No President can admit, even to himself, that his problems stem from his inability to persuade the people of the rightness of his purpose. When a President's designs are frustrated he must demonstrate, at least to his own satisfaction, that the popular will was with him, but was somehow divested or discarded by the machinery of government.
> The most satisfying method of achieving these rationalizations psychologically, is to zero in on Congress.

In the case of Central America, Reedy's words ring true. The American people, I know at least in my district, do not support the administration and its policies there, because these policies simply are not working. Just like Vietnam. If perhaps, there could have been some definition of a possibility of "victory," the President might have had support, but people do not support policies that do not work. Reagan may blame Congress, but the real culprit, of course, is himself in his unwise, counterproductive foreign actions or policy actions in Central America.

Central America, we must never forget, like most of Latin America, is a region which suffers from extreme poverty, illiteracy, maldistribution of wealth. Its people held enthralled by some of the world's most brutal and corrupt governments. We have been identified with those brutal and corrupt governments. We imposed the Somocista regime, which is what the Nicaraguan Revolution is all about.

But this administration has steadfastly refused to call for reforms, failed to address the causes of unrest and revolution, causes that would motivate us, anyone in our country, to fight. Instead, the countries of Central America have been militarized by our administration like never before in the history of the region.

At this moment, and now for about a year, we have surrounded Nicaragua alone with 30,000 of our military, in the air, on the land, on the sea. Military aid has been pumped into the civil war in El Salvador. Arms are flowing to the so-called rebels or Contras in Nicaragua. United States-Honduran military exercises easily take place off both coasts of Central America.

Salvadorans, terrified by the brutality of the bloodletting, are fleeing in increasing numbers to their country's main backer, the United States. While some would like to deport these war-weary Salvadorans, I support the proposed freeze on the deportation of unauthorized Salvadoran refugees. Surely our Nation must bear some burden for their misery, the misery that we are helping to perpetrate in that region. But a freeze on deportation merely treats the symptoms of the crisis in Central America, just like the proposed amendments to our Immigration and Naturalization Act with respect to illegal entry through Mexico.

Part of the cause of the problem in the area is the United States, whose policies of intervention in the region, both in the present and in the past, have helped to polarize the region ideologically, politically, and economically. If this polarization is to be reversed, the United States must terminate policies that militarize our southern neighbors.

First of all, we must and should—and I have been advocating this for months—remove all military adviser personnel from both Honduras and El Salvador. The nation of El Salvador and the Nicaraguan-Honduran and Honduran-El Salvador borders are areas of hostility as defined by the War Powers Resolution. U.S. Journalists, Congressmen, military personnel enter the area at greater risk to their lives than ever before.

Given that, U.S. military personnel have been deployed in Honduras, have been participating in the Salvadoran civil war, and directing Salvadoran troops with U.S. reconnaissance planes and also using them to bomb with, A-37's.

I have introduced a resolution that would invoke the War Powers Resolution, directing the President to remove U.S. troops within 60 days, unless the Congress declares war. I urge my colleagues to give this proposal the urgent attention that it deserves. If Congress does not act now to exercise its constitutional right to decide where and when U.S. Armed Forces will be involved in war, this President will continue to expand our military involvement in Central America and other parts of Latin America.

Consider the facts and consider the case spelled out in the War Powers Act.

First, there can be no question that the United States is involved in hostilities, just as in the case of Beirut, where the President answered in December 1982 that the marines were there in nonhostile, even though they were fully equipped for combat, and that they were there as peacekeepers. The same thing here. Even though the War Powers Resolution did not contemplate clandestine or secret wars, it is clear that a number of U.S. military personnel must, in one way or another, be involved in the support of the CIA operation against Nicaragua alone.

If we need further evidence of the hostile nature of the area in which our forces are operating, consider only that the U.S. helicopters, supposedly operating inside the friendly airspace of Honduras, have been repeatedly attacked, most recently when a helicopter bearing two U.S. Senators was forced down by hostile gunfire. Or consider that American advisers in El Salvador have been in the midst of firefights. Or consider that U.S. personnel fly military observation and bombing mission flights that are in the nature of direct combat support of the Salvadoran Government's forces.

In the curious way that our troops are counted, however, the Americans who train Salvadorans in camps located in Honduras are not counted among the Salvadoran advisers. It depends on when the count is taken. If the count is to be taken on a certain day, they move our troops from Salvadoran soil back to Honduras and count, and bring them back the next day. Neither are the American fliers who provide combat reconnaissance missions counted as advisers because of the handy technicality that their bases are in Honduras, not in Salvador; nor are American medical personnel counted as advisers.

These and other subterfuges are used to obscure the fact that American armed forces for combat have been introduced into Central America in ever-growing numbers, and for purposes other than training. These are facts that exactly fit the case of the War Powers Resolution. These are armed forces being built up in foreign areas for purposes well beyond any training mission. Their deployment is, therefore, subject to the War Powers Resolution.

Likewise, these forces are operating in a hostile area and the environment there is growing more violent as each day passes. It is absolutely inevitable that American personnel who are so intimately engaged in the conflicts of Central America will come under increasing fire and fall victims to that fire.

The only question right now is when? The fact of the danger cannot be denied. The American Embassy in El Salvador suffers from occasional attacks. A key adviser has been murdered there. Military personnel assigned to units in the countryside have come under fire a number of times in the past few months, many times wholly unreported.

Nor are these the only such incidents. The fact of the hostile environment cannot be ignored, and it is also a case that fits the definition of the War Powers Resolution. Untold numbers of Americans have died and are continuing to die, shot down in the planes in which they are contracted out for by the CIA, not only over Salvador but over Honduras and Nicaraguan areas. Those poor Americans, of course, are what used to be defined as mercenaries and nobody counts them when they are killed.

The question is whether the Congress is willing to act to preserve its prerogatives of determining when and for what purpose this country will get into war. There can no longer be any doubt that the Reagan administration is pursuing a course of war in Central America. I have said this. I have said on this House floor for months that President Reagan has gone mongering after that false bitch goddess of war. Is that the course we want to take? I do not think so, but we ought to find out by doing it the way the Constitution says we ought to, and that is right here in the Congress.

If we believe what the President says, or the basic premises, we ought to declare war, help him, legalize it, make it legal, for we learned in Vietnam that blood and treasure from Americans is no substitute for decent government and reasonable justice in the client country. There can be no dispute that the Central American case is a situation that the War Powers Resolution applies to, and I do sincerely urge early action on my resolution.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE HONORABLE CARDISS COLLINS

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Honorable CARDISS COLLINS:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 13, 1984.

Hon. THOMAS (TIP) O'NEILL,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Speaker's Office, H-204, U.S. Capitol, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to inform you that I have received a subpoena duces tecum issued by the Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois. In consultation with the General Counsel to the Clerk of the House, I have determined that compliance with this subpoena is consistent with the privileges and precedents of the House.

Sincerely,

CARDISS COLLINS,
Member of Congress.

VOTERS DISLIKE EARLY NETWORK ELECTION PROJECTIONS

(Mr. SWIFT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, toward the end of last year, T.V. Guide magazine ran two articles entitled "Let's Stop T.V. From Spoiling Our Elections." The articles discussed several aspects of the complex relationship between the television news media and our elections, including the impact of early network projections of election results.

TV Guide also did an editorial on the subject, at the end of which they encouraged interested readers to write to me, as chairman of the House Task Force on Elections.

Well over 1,100 citizens, from 49 of the 50 States, accepted that invitation. Exactly four of those hundreds of letters—one each from Maryland, Maine, Vermont, and New Jersey—defended early projections by the news media. The following quotations are samples of the sentiments of some of the other people who took the time to write.

I commend their comments to the attention of the network executives in New York who, after 4 years in which public anger and frustration have not only not declined, but if anything have increased, still question the depth of that feeling.

Also, I would like to mention that the committee report on House Concurrent Resolution 227, the resolution expressing the sense of the Congress with respect to the adverse impact of early projections of election results by the news media, has just been filed.

When that resolution is before the full House, I urge all my colleagues to support it in order to send a strong, clear message to the television networks asking, on behalf of the voters all across this country, that they exercise voluntary restraint in making early projections.

ALABAMA

"I vote in Clarke County, Alabama, Central Time Belt. On the last Presidential elections, 1980, the T.V. projections of Mr. Reagan's win came before our polls closed here. You can see how the other two zones, and those here who had not voted would feel. Why bother, it's all over!! It is grossly unfair. . . . Their projections might not be right, if everyone had a chance to vote first."

ALASKA

"During the last Presidential election we . . . knew the outcome before we went to vote."

ARIZONA

". . . stop TV reporters, etc. from calling the election before our polls even close."

"It is indeed discouraging to live here in the Southwest and have the fun taken out of election day for us, not to mention the distinct effect such announcements do have on voting practices . . ."

ARKANSAS

"It didn't help the people on the West Coast and Alaska & Hawaii when Pres. Ron Reagan won in a landslide . . . before it even got there, thanks to . . . the press and its projections."

CALIFORNIA

"No results should be released until all of the polls are closed and all of the votes counted. I would guess that it might make the 5 o'clock news of the day after the polls closed."

". . . Most important that ALL newscasters (Radio, T.V. and newspapers) keep their opinions and results to themselves . . . until ALL votes are counted."

"It seems ridiculous to me that before many westerners have a chance to vote, the world knows who the winners are. The winners certainly are not the western voters."

"As a resident at various times of both California and Hawaii I have personally witnessed friends and acquaintances choosing not to bother to vote . . . after hearing network projections. . . ."

"In Calif. we call the heads of a voting precinct the Inspector. I've been inspector in our neighborhood precinct . . . . for the past 10 years. . . . [O]ur last Presidential election was a farce. We had voters come here at 7:00, nearly crying because of the east coast's broadcasting their results before we'd even closed, one hour later."

"It is about time all the rhetoric about my vote making a difference really meant something. I want my vote to count."

"I was really disappointed with our last election, that I wasn't going to vote ever again! . . . . I know one thing for sure, I'm going to give this address to all my friends, who refused to go to the polls, after watching the T.V. newscast, 3 years ago."

"Something must be done about this T.V. early projections of Election Returns. I have worked for L.A. County—teaching Inspectors of Election Boards—and serving as Inspector on Boards. It's insulting to voters to expect them to come to the polls after work, when they've already heard on their car radio and T.V. who has already won the election. Uniform poll closing, Sunday Voting—or simply a legal gag on the media regarding all information until all polls are closed."

"I strongly believe that broadcasting election results prior to the closing of polls in all the states must be prohibited. In my opinion, this does not violate First Amendment rights. It does not keep the media (especially Television) from exercising their "rights"—it merely puts a time limit on doing so."

"I was one person rushing to vote after a super busy day only to hear on the news my vote didn't count. Before you know it only a few will vote, the rest won't and you know as well as I do what that means—it scares the hell out of me."

"The cry should of been Foul and not counted, and a new election date for President should have been processed."

"I am sorry to say that last election, I let the T.V. predictions keep me home. I realize now what an injustice I did to the local candidates and I don't want it to happen again. It seems to me the major networks, instead of reporting the news are attempting to predict the news."

"In 1980 I was driving home from work on my way to the polls when it was announced that Reagan had won. So, instead of voting for the loser, Carter, I went on and voted for Anderson just so that he could get the matching funds I felt he deserved."

"Calif. had many disgruntled voters after the last fiasco in 1980 and we would very much hate to see a repeat. Obviously the election was run for the benefit of the media. They did not win any popularity polls by announcing the winners long before the polls had closed in the West and neither will Congress if the policy is continued."

"* * * we are sick of * * * giving the networks the opportunity to ruin elections for many people, primarily those of us out west who still have hours left to vote sometimes when they announce back east who they think wins or loses."

COLORADO

"All the suspense has been taken out of the elections by having winners projected so early. We don't even bother to watch it anymore."

"I am very much in favor of stopping T.V. from announcing the election outcome before the polls close."

CONNECTICUT

"While the press has every right to coverage, I do not believe this coverage should be allowed to affect the course of the election."

"I'm highly in favor of withholding all predictions until all polls are closed on voting days."

DELAWARE

"I wish it were possible to get a 24-hour voting time . . . to eliminate the unfair advantage the Eastern U.S. holds."

FLORIDA

"I was appalled at the media reporting so called results of the Presidential race of Carter and Reagan, hours before the polls had closed. It did nothing but cause us to lose faith in our system."

"It is very disturbing to hear who the next President will be when you haven't had time to go vote yet—this encourages people not to vote."

"We think it is wrong to allow the news media to project the winners. Indeed stupid, why vote when the winner is being announced?"

"We definitely wish to see reform regarding the farce that is perpetually repeated on T.V. every four years by forecasters predicting winners hours before polls are closed elsewhere."

GEORGIA

"Although I am a resident of the East Coast, I was appalled when television newsmen projected election results so early in the evening before the voters in later time zones had made their choices for candidates."

"I think the projection of election winners before the polls closed everywhere during the last Presidential election was atrocious and very discouraging to those who had not yet voted."

". . . prevent the east coast press from predicting the outcome so early and unfortunately so accurately that the west coast voters tend not to turnout."

HAWAII

"We are angry that we here in Hawaii are informed, even before our polls close, who the winner is."

"I'm not in favor of starting broadcasting until all polls are closed."

"Every Presidential election in which I ever voted was conceded before my vote was cast. This is very important to those of us who live in the state of Hawaii."

IDAHO

"It is depressing to just be going to vote as the Eastern U.S. is announcing winners and participating in victory celebration. It makes my vote seem worthless."

ILLINOIS

"I am discouraged, if I do vote late, to have the winner projected before I even get my chance to vote. I think this keeps many people in the West from voting and yet, how important that they do".

"I believe the media and T.V. reporting are changing the elections unfairly."

". . . prevent the ridiculous T.V. polls that forecast the winners before other time zone areas close their polls."

". . . the T.V. channels should be prevented by law to air election winning projections before all polls close."

IOWA

"Every voter from Maine to Hawaii needs to feel that his or her vote counts the same . . ."

KANSAS

". . . please stop the projecting the outcome before the polls are closed. And then not for hours later as it is killing the votes for state and local elections."

". . . 1980 . . . was absurd for 2 reasons . . . . 2. The disgusting practice of the network's compulsion to project election winners before the polls are closed everywhere."

LOUISIANA

"I know for a fact that my relatives on the west coast have poor voter attendance records due to the news media's projections on their broadcasts (which I also find very irritating)."

". . . although we live in the South and are not affected by the early media reports indicating the winner before all the polls are closed, both my husband and I have always felt that this detracted from the way an election, especially a presidential election, should be run."

MAINE

"No predictions ever!"

"I urge immediate passage of . . . media restraint as regards exit polls."

MASSACHUSETTS

"Stop the senseless 'projections' by newscasters. . . . I am definitely all for freedom of speech and of the press, but this goes beyond simple reporting of the news."

"I was quite shocked in 1980 when . . . the media proclaimed Reagan the new president, when the polls in the West were still open, and had three more hours to go."

MICHIGAN

". . . prevent the present T.V. disenfranchisement of our Western fellow Americans."

"It is stupid to allow the T.V. media to predict who will be president when the polls are beginning to open."

"The election of the President has been a farce for years and was the worst in the 1980 election. To have the election decided before California closed its doors was ridiculous."

MINNESOTA

"The law should also mean no predictions of results with 1% of the districts reporting in a few key precincts. Let the election polls all close before any precincts report to anybody."

"The East coast should keep their mouth shut until the West coast is done."

"I would not be interested in voting if I heard the report earlier."

". . . do away with premature reporting of election returns before all of the voting is finished."

"Did not vote last presidential (vote day)—News had already conceded election to Reagan."

"I am thoroughly opposed to the practice of major networks announcing presidential election winners within minutes following the first closings of polls. It is most unfair to those citizens . . . who may not yet have voted. . . . From a selfish point of view, it is also unfair to me, a T.V. viewer, who watches the election returns because of the unfolding drama and sense of involvement. It is not unlike watching a football game, Academy Awards presentation, or Miss America Pageant, in the sense that if one knew the winner before-hand, one's interest level would plummet."

"My husband, my Mom, and myself were extremely upset when Reagan was declared the winner before we even voted at 6:30 p.m."

MONTANA

"As a citizen from a Western state, I strongly resent the early projections by the news media."

". . . do something about the way T.V. is projecting winners before half the nation has voted."

NEBRASKA

"I also favor a very heavy fine for any network or news media who violate these procedures."

"The media has become too influential of West Coast voting . . ."

NEVADA

"I would say it is a good idea to hold the news back on projecting the President winner."

". . . can't something be done about prohibiting exit polls by the news media? . . . We realize there must be freedom of the press, but the practice is extremely detrimental."

NEW JERSEY

". . . our whole country is too much affected when T.V. tells the nation the winner and we [do] not like it."

"I wasn't aware that the effect of early projections cause a serious problem and I have been informed. Time to change . . ."

"I . . . realize that because of time differences many people in the West may not exercise their right to vote because of predictions made on radio and television before polls close in the West. Why couldn't the results on presidential elections be kept from the press until the polls are closed in the West?"

"I believe that the voters on the West Coast could easily be swayed by hearing how the vote is going on the East Coast."

NEW YORK

"I really sympathize with the voters in Western States, especially Alaska and Hawaii, who must feel their votes are like vestigial organs—totally unnecessary. Watching the T.V. coverage at night is exciting, but only if you don't know the outcome 5 minutes after you turn it on."

"I am enclosing an article . . . pertaining to . . . network T.V.'s irresponsible handling of the projections after some of the polls have closed. I've felt something must be done even before reading the article because I'm sure that on the West Coast if it hasn't happened already, it will in the future; that is having the networks 'elect' a candidate for office instead of the voters."

"It is ludicrous that results from the East are announced before voting is completed in the West."

"The elections of persons who don't care anything about ordinary citizens might not have happened if later voters had not been discouraged by media projections."

". . . the media has no business making projections; their function is to report the news, that is in this case, the election returns. I cannot tell how much it irks me to see a very close tally on the board, but to have one candidate 'declared' a winner. In my view, especially with the West Coast problem taken into consideration, these 'projections' are tantamount to tampering with an election—which, I believe, is a crime, is it not?"

NORTH CAROLINA

"I believe everyone in this country is upset about a new President being named before the votes were counted across this land of ours. I do not live on the West Coast—but if I did I would not bother to vote next time. It seems like the television news ratings runs this country—not we the people who vote."

OHIO

"It has bothered me for years to have the T.V. project the outcome too early. It is not fair and means that people in the West do not think their votes important."

"I . . . believe that voting results should not be broadcast until all polls throughout the country are closed."

"It has often bothered us that the television news media is able to project a winner, especially in the Presidential race, when their coverage of returns begins at 8:00 p.m. This should be changed. If I were a Californian or a Hawaiian, I would be extremely upset knowing that my vote wasn't going to mean anything because the networks had already projected a winner."

OKLAHOMA

"We are in favor of . . . uniform poll closings all across the nation, clear to Hawaii. As now observed, the voting can't be fair."

OREGON

"As a west coast voter, I am very much interested in something being done to make sure that our votes are going to count."

" . . television technology and news commentaries are predicting and deciding who are winning the elections . . ."

"In 1980, I wrote to NBC about the early 'call' of the elections. I got an unsympathetic and terse reply. The networks are in competition and do not care about 'we, the people.' "

"I for one do not intend to vote until the laws are changed. Why should I? My vote does not count! How can anyone tell me it does when last year I had only walked to my car after voting and already the presidency was decided. Please get the laws changed. I'd like to be counted too."

PENNSYLVANIA

". . . in the Western states . . . early Eastern returns have kept voter interest low and affected several races for Congress."

"Voters on the West Coast must feel completely disenfranchised in cases such as the 1980 election when the decision was final by 8 PM EST!"

"Do not allow the media to project winners . . ."

". . . permit those voters in the West, Alaska and Hawaii to cast votes which are equally important to any Election, without early predictions from the Eastern states, which in essence, tell those voters in the West, that 'it's all over.' "

SOUTH CAROLINA

"Recently with T.V. computer-aided, results forecasting, late-day Western voters have been discouraged from voting by the belief that 'it didn't matter now.' "

". . . eliminate the awful prospect of early T.V. projections discouraging voters in the West from making their opinions known."

TENNESSEE

"I . . . feel that the time has come for the television networks to assume the responsibility of reporting the election results and stop projecting them. I like to be kept informed, but they are carrying it too far."

TEXAS

"Not just Pacific Coast but Mountain time-zone residents are adversely affected by the present system."

". . . if I were a Californian, Hawaiian, or Alaskan, I probably wouldn't vote in a landslide election . . . I never have liked the early projections."

"As a teacher and as a writer, I believe our First Amendment to the Constitution to be invaluable . . . but I do not believe the public's 'right to know' should be abused and used as a tactic in altering the outcome of our elections! As things stand now, that is just what is happening."

UTAH

"Living in the West, it is hardly fair for us voters to know the outcome of an election (based on T.V. news projections) before we even get a chance to vote."

VIRGINIA

"Even though I live on the East Coast, I'm sick to death of hearing projections—sometimes even before our own polls have closed, and can imagine how the people on the West Coast must feel."

" . . . the T.V. stations should not make 'Predictions' on winners of elections at all! If they must predict winners, they should wait until all the polls across the nation have closed."

WASHINGTON

"I can remember in the last election my feelings when the news kind of told the west coast who had won no matter what or who voted; this happened at 5:30. Two hours before the west coast closing of the polls. Please change this so that our west coast vote makes a difference. Why vote if it doesn't?"

" . . . eliminate the current disenfranchisement that exists for all of us who live in the west and are informed hours before our polls close that our votes are meaningless because the network news services have projected winners in all races!"

". . . irresponsible handling of election coverage by all the networks, including radio . . . systematically excluded millions of thoughtful voters in the western part of the United States and Hawaii."

"In their fervor to 'report the news' the media seems to have gotten their priorities mixed. I don't believe in 'censoring' the news but I do believe everyone should have a chance to vote without being told in advance who won. And did they really win? Who is to say what the outcome would have been if the media had kept a lid on the returns until all had voted. Frankly, we were damned mad. They violated our civil rights!"

"I have written . . . concerning the disenfranchisement of the last election, where all workers going home from work at 4 PM were told the election was over."

"When Reagan was elected I hadn't voted yet. It was only 5 pm Pacific time. All the networks had him as the projected winner."

". . . we favor . . . law banning T.V. & Radio stations from telling the public, who is winning where, they are the ones that are making their candidates win. Are we going to be governed by a bunch of armchair politicians? That's what's happening . . . . [T]ell these smart aleck scandal mongers to keep their mouths shut."

WEST VIRGINIA

"The relative disenfranchising of any people is unfair to all the people."

". . . we are in a way disenfranchising our friends and neighbors to the West by predicting the outcome of national elections even before their polls close."

WISCONSIN

"Stop T.V. news from spoiling our elections—particularly for western voters."

"During the 1980 presidential election, I was standing in line in the cold of Madison, Wisconsin when I heard that Reagan had already won. I almost turned around and went home, but I decided the other local elections were also important. Still . . ."●

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET ON CURRENT LEVEL OF SPENDING AND REVENUES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1984

(Mr. JONES of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the procedures of the Committee on the Budget and section 311(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, I am submitting to the RECORD a letter to the Speaker advising him of the current level of spending and revenues for fiscal year 1984.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, D.C., April 25, 1984.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On January 30, 1976, the Committee on the Budget outlined the procedure which it had adopted in connection with its responsibilities under Section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to provide estimates of the current level of revenues and spending.

Pursuant to Committee Rule 10, I am herewith transmitting the status report under H. Con. Res. 91, the First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for Fiscal Year 1984. This report reflects the adjusted resolution of October 25, 1983, and the current CBO estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues. The attachments show the latest estimate for the current level of fiscal year 1984 spending and divide that amount among committees.

The procedural situation with regard to the spending ceiling will be affected this year by Section 5(b) of H. Con. Res. 91. As I explained during debate on the conference report on that resolution, enforcement against breaches of the spending ceiling under Section 311(a) of the Budget Act will not apply where a measure would not cause a committee to exceed its appropriate allocation pursuant to Section 302(a) of the Budget Act. In the House, the appropriate 302(a) allocation includes "new discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" only. It should be noted that under this procedure neither the total level of outlays nor a committee's outlay allocation is considered. This exception is only provided because an automatic budget resolution is in effect and would cease to apply if Congress were to revise the budget resolution for fiscal year 1984.

The intent of the Section 302(a) "discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" subceiling provided by Section 5(b) of the resolution is to protect a committee that has stayed within its spending allocation—discretionary budget authority and new entitlement authority—from points of order if the total spending ceiling has been breached for reasons outside of its control. The 302(a) allocations to House committees made pursuant to the conference report on H. Con. Res. 91 were printed in the Congressional Record, June 22, 1983, H. 4326. Adjustments to such allocations made pursuant to Section 2 of House Concurrent Resolution 91, the reserve fund, are reflected in House Reports 98-313, 98-354, 98-381, and 98-439.

The attached tables show where each committee currently stands comared to its 302(a) allocation of discretionary budget authority and of new entitlement authority.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

JAMES R. JONES, Chairman.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

INFLATION WATCH

HON. LLOYD BENTSEN

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, the staff of the Joint Economic Committee has undertaken an inflation watch project. They are monitoring recent key developments affecting prices and reviewing the outlook for inflation.

Public expectation about inflation crucially affect the economy in a number of ways. If the public expects higher inflation in the future, this will:

First, lead to demands for larger wage increases, to try to keep up with or ahead of the expected increase in prices. This can set off an inflationary price-wage spiral;

Second, lead to higher interest rates, as investors demand a greater inflation premium in order to maintain the same real rate of return; and

Third, discourage saving, as consumers buy now, before prices accelerate. This stimulates the economy in the short run, but hurts it in the long run by making funds for productive investment less available.

The Survey Research Center at the University of Michigan provides monthly estimates of the public's view about inflation. They ask approximately 700 Americans two questions:

First, during the next 12 months, do you think that prices in general will go up, or down, or stay where they are now? and

Second, by about what percent do you expect prices to go up, on the average, during the next 12 months?

The most recent survey was conducted in March 1984. Responses every 6 months since March 1981 have been:

Date of survey	Percentage of respondents expecting prices to:[1]					Average increase expected (percent)
	Remain same or decrease	Rise, by indicated percentage
		1 to 5	6 to 9	10 or more	Rise, don't know amount
March 1981	26	21	11	29	11	7.0
September 1981	30	21	11	30	7	7.5
March 1982	32	29	12	23	2	6.0
September 1982	31	30	13	19	5	5.4
March 1983	44	35	5	12	3	3.3
September 1983	28	43	7	17	4	5.0
March 1984	24	45	10	16	4	5.1

[1] Responses do not add to 100 percent because 1 to 2 percent had no opinion, or responses not available.

Source: Survey Research Center, University of Michigan.

Inflationary expectations fell between September 1981 and March 1983, but the average predicted increase in prices has risen by more than 50 percent in the last year, from 3.3 percent in March 1983 to 5.1 percent last month. This exceeds the administration's forecast of a 4.5-percent rise in prices this year. In the past this survey has underestimated prices in periods of accelerating inflation such as the current situation. This suggests that the public view that prices will rise by 5.1 percent over the next 12 months is likely to be conservative.

Last month one-fourth of those surveyed thought inflation will be 6 percent or more over the next year, and one-sixth believe that we will have inflation of 10 percent or more. Both figures have risen sharply over the past year.

In summary, the American public is becoming more pessimistic about inflation; in the past such changing views have foreshadowed periods of faster price increases. This increasing pessimism is rooted in our inability to reverse the deficit trend, and they pose the threat of becoming self-fulfilling prophecies as long as the present economic surge persists side-by-side with soaring deficits. The lesson, Mr. President, is that Congress must act now, this year, to reverse the rising deficit trend. The time for talk is over. Only action will head off a substantial surge in prices and place us back where we were in 1979 and 1980. The House of Representatives has passed a $182 billion deficit reduction program, and the Senate must at least match that to make meaningful headway against deficits.●

BIRTHDAY PRESENT FOR THE ARCHIVES

HON. JACK BROOKS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, an editorial in this morning's Washington Post begins, "The National Archives, the official preserver of this Nation's history, celebrates its 50th birthday this year. Congress ought to give the institution a suitable present—its independence." I agree wholeheartedly with the sentiments expressed by the Post editorial. The Committee on Government Operations yesterday filed the report on the bill H.R. 3987, the National Archives and Records Administration Act of 1984. This bill would establish an independent Archives and remove it from the bureaucratic structure of the General Services Administration.

In the course of considering this legislation the committee became aware of the serious damage that has been done to the operations of the Archives by virtue of its placement within GSA. The committee concluded that establishing the Archives as an independent agency, the status it held when it was created 50 years ago, would improve its ability to carry out the vital work of handling and preserving our Nation's documentary heritage.

I realize that establishing an independent Archives is not a panacea and that making this organizational move will not, in itself, insure the success of the Archives' operations. But, what it will do is to remove an impediment to those operations, make the Archives' leadership fully accountable and responsible for those operations, and enable them to exercise innovative and vigorous leadership on behalf of the Archives.

I urge my colleagues to read the following Washington Post editorial and to consider its views when H.R. 3987 comes to the floor:

BIRTHDAY PRESENT FOR THE ARCHIVES

The National Archives, the official preserver of this nation's history, celebrates its 50th birthday this year. Congress ought to give the institution a suitable present—its independence.

Fifty years is not very old for an archive, even one in a nation as youthful as this. Many of the Archives' current difficulties stem from the fact that, while it struggles to keep abreast of the exponentially increasing records of current government, it must try to undo the damage caused by years of neglect. Before Congress set up the Archives in 1934, for example, many War Department records moldered in the White House's basement garage. (You can see photos of the mess in the Archives today.) One of the archivists' first jobs was to fumigate and catalogue the tattered remains.

Even so the Archives has managed to become one of the great historical treasure troves of the world. While President Reagan catches up on the latest happenings in China, for example, scholars from China will be searching our Archives for records of their own history lost to them in the tumult of the postwar period. So will scholars from Germany, Bulgaria and numerous other countries, along with many Americans in search of their country's or their own family's history.

The Archives has never had the resources it needs to catch up with its preservation work, and its troubles have increased since it lost its independent status when Congress tidied up government organization charts in 1949. As a stepchild of the General Services Administration—an agency that has had more than enough of its own trouble keeping track of the federal stock of pens, paper clips and paraphernalia—the Archives is unable to make its case to the Office of Management and Budget and Congress for the skilled personnel and resources it needs.

The Archives' vulnerability to political whim was clearly demonstrated early in this administration when GSA volunteered the institution for one of the sharpest staff cuts suffered by any agency. Congress, alerted late to the effect of the cuts, has tried to restore part of the losses, but the Archives' backlog of work continues to grow. To protect the agency from future neglect, committees in both houses have reported bills restoring independent status to the Archives. The measures have strong bipartisan support led by Sens. Charles Mathias, Thomas Eagleton and Mark Hatfield in the Senate and Reps. Jack Brooks and Glenn English in the House. But Congress has its attention focused on next November. It needs to take a few minutes out to think about the future beyond that.●

A BETTER WAY IN SAN JOSE

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. I am pleased to share with my colleagues an article that appears in the May 1984 edition of Psychology Today which features the achievements of San Jose's chief of police, Joseph McNamara. Chief McNamara has brought a unique leadership style to the San Jose Police Force, transforming a once troubled department into a widely respected example of the kind of positive role a law enforcement body can play in a community. It has been my pleasure to work with Joe over the years, and I hope my colleagues will benefit from learning of the positive influence of his innovative approach to law enforcement.

A BETTER WAY IN SAN JOSE

In his book, "Psychologist With A Gun," Harvey Schlossberg, a New York cop who became a psychologist, argues that, "unfortunately, the only thing some lawbreakers respect is force. It is the way they have been brought up. As children they were beaten by their parents to make them obey, and as adults they obey only when authority is brutal. You cannot control some criminals unless you threaten them with force."

San Jose Polce Chief Joseph McNamara takes vehement issue with this philosophy. "If your stance in the community is that we're tougher than you are, then you're going to escalate violence. You're guaranteed failure with that kind of approach."

McNamara was hired by San Jose seven years ago to reform what one community organizer referred to as "a police force gone wild." A few years before McNamara was hired, for example, a black chemist at IBM was killed by a San Jose police officer after a minor traffic violation. The city hired McNamara because he had worked with the minority community in Kansas City, Missouri, where he was police chief for three years. Before that, he had been on the New York police force for 16 years and had earned a doctorate in public administration from Harvard.

"We tell our police officers that they are professionals, just like doctors or lawyers or psychologists. We tell them they need to remain objective about their work even when someone is terribly unfair and angry at them. It's understandable to get angry, but we are saying they are better than the average person in their ability to maintain calm and cool. That's what they're paid for.

"It took awhile, but it's worked better than I ever imagined. When I started, the cops were furious with me about changes they now take for granted. When I came here, members of the City Council had asked the U.S. Civil Rights Commission to monitor the department for abuses. Now the commission says we are a model for the country."

McNamara works closely with Mike Roberts, who was hired as a police psychologist 13 years ago. Roberts now also advises and does psychological screening for more than 40 other police agencies around the country. Although his original mandate with San Jose was to "weed out the crazy cops," his screening, which includes a battery of psychological tests and an in-depth interview, goes further. After evaluating each applicant, he assigns a letter grade, A, B, C, D or F, which serves as his recommendation to the department. He reports a high correlation between the letter grades and the applicants' later success in police work.

Since Roberts was hired, the number of citizen complaints against officers has decreased 50 percent. He credits the improvement to the current police chief, the psychological screenings and a good field-training program. After graduating from the police academy, recruits work in the field under close supervision for 14 weeks. This "gives the department an opportunity to evaluate performance on the streets," Roberts says, and acts as a safety net for any mistakes made in the initial screening.

Sergeant Norm Puneo, a 16-year veteran, is proud of the way the department operates now but acknowledges that some of the veterans miss the freedom they had when streetwise criminals tried to avoid the San Jose city limits. "Now, when we pick up people who have been arrested in other California cities, they can't believe the way we treat them. They just expect to be beaten up."

However, both he and the internal affairs commander, Lieutenant Mike Dwyer, question whether San Jose's methods would work everywhere. "When people from other police agencies come, we take them around, we take them to the poorest section of the East Side and they say, 'Where are your slums?' "

"Our red-light district is half a block long," Dwyer adds. "In this department, we discipline officers for calling people ——. I'm not sure that would work in New York."

McNamara, who feels very strongly about the issue of name-calling, counters, "I worked in Harlem as a street officer for 10 years, and I never called anyone a name. If the public can't tell the difference between the good guys and the bad guys, then we're lost. And yes, we do discipline police for using foul language. Again and again we say, 'How can you feel better than the people who break the laws if you break the rules? You may think it's perfectly reasonable to call someone an ——, but the public is shocked and so are juries. They expect more from police officers.' "

Attitudes about use of violence must change from the top to the bottom to be effective. "I tell the supervisors it's their job to keep their men out of trouble, but accountability is not an end in itself. We need to work on peer pressure because no matter how much you hold a supervisor responsible, you're not going to know what happens on the streets unless someone reports it."

McNamara acknowledges that the taboo against snitching is powerful but points out that police agencies have been able to penetrate the protective code in the area of corruption.

"The cops themselves became so opposed to it, they started reporting it. We are beginning to see the same thing happen with abuse of authority. Like corruption, once you hold excessive force up to the light, no one can defend it, not even cops."●

CITIZENSHIP AND OUR CONSTITUTION

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, the following essay, entitled "My Role In Upholding Our Constitution," was written by a young constituent of mine from Danville, Vt., and was the Vermont winner of the 1983-84 Voice of Democracy Scholarship program.

This program, under the sole sponsorship of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, encourages young Americans to reflect on the significance of freedom and democracy in this country and the importance of this in their lives. The subject of this year's essay stresses the responsibilities we have as individuals to insure that our country continues to reflect the fundamental beliefs that our Founding Fathers so wisely outlined in our Constitution. I believe Vermont's winner, Miss Marianne Incerpi, has done this splendidly in her essay which I share with you here.

MY ROLE IN UPHOLDING OUR CONSTITUTION

A very special relationship exists between the citizens of the United States and their Constitution.

My role as an individual in upholding the Constitution is to make known my concerns and take action on issues regarding the governing of our democratic society. I can do research, compile facts, and take positive action toward the accomplishment of my goal.

Propaganda is only one way to inform people of concern over an issue. Crisis, dramatic events, and eloquent speakers also make citizens aware of situations and influence public opinion.

You, and I, and the other citizens of this country have a responsibility to remain informed and to express our opinions to government officials.

Interest groups are another way to inform legislators of special interest needs. We can join and become active in interest groups supporting our ideas. If none exists we still have the right, even the responsibility, to inform legislators of our concerns.

Legislation that will directly affect your welfare may fall under the category of public interest or consumer lobbies rather than special interest groups.

An individual has some power but many people striving towards common goals is the strength of our country. We must continue to pull together and defend our rights and ideals.

We can lobby by presenting well-prepared arguments for a cause or simply writing well thought-out and formulated letters to influential people.

Letters, posters, discussions, petitions, campaigning, and demonstrations are all forms of lobbying available to Americans.

We need to get out and vote. An appallingly low percentage of all registered voters actually exercise that hard earned right.

The individual vote carries more power than many people realize. Public opinion—the point of view of many individuals and groups—is what determines the outcome of most political conflicts. Abraham Lincoln stated it well when he said, "It is rare that public sentiment decides immorally or unwisely."

All Americans must take an active interest in our government. We can read political advertisements and propaganda, vote, write to legislators, petition, campaign, testify at legislative hearings, deliver speeches, or run for office. Both sides of an issue need to be analyzed. Concerned citizens must keep an open mind and never overlook the opposing viewpoints.

To uphold my constitutional rights I must not only support or oppose existing legislation, but initiate changes I feel are necessary. An informed citizen must confer with local, state, or federal representatives to help formulate a reasonable solution or alternative to problems.

The Preamble of the Constitution establishes the foundation and goals upon which the governing process I've outlined is built.

That foundation is,

We, the People—We must remind ourselves the Constitution was written by the people, for the people. The citizens of this country determine the future of the nation.

The goals of that Constitution are,

(1) To Form a More Perfect Union—We must continually strive to better ourselves and our environment through education and hard work.

(2) Establish Justice—We must determine and execute what is good and fair for man and society.

(3) Insure Domestic Tranquility—The family is the basic unit in our society. As this nation is a large family we must preserve inner peace.

(4) Provide for the Common Defense—As a nation, we have to provide for the bodily defense of our citizens. What is the best way to confront this need? In the words of writer George P. Morris in "The Flag of our Nation", "United we stand, divided we fall."

(5) Promote the General Welfare—The physical and psychological well-being of our citizens is of utmost importance as they are our governing body.

(6) Secure the Blessings of Liberty to Ourselves and our Posterity—We have built a great country with democracy as our governing process and the guarantee of basic freedoms. These ideals are the foundation of our society and we must preserve them not only for ourselves but for our children and future generations. The relationship I have proposed between the citizens of the United States and their Constitution is firmly rooted in my belief that we must share the responsibilities of citizenship in a democratic society.●

IN REMEMBRANCE OF THE HOLOCAUST

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, April 29, marks Yom HaShoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day. Also, 40 years ago that day, Nazi troops began their campaign to exterminate the Hungarian Jewish Community. For Hungary's more than 700,000 Jews, April 29 signaled their entrance into the hell of Hitler's final solution. Among those carried away to the gas chambers of Auschwitz and Birkenau were all four of my grandparents, most of my parents' sisters and brothers and their children, as well as a large number of other relatives.

In remembrance of the European Jews and other ethnic, religious, and political groups annihilated by Nazi Germany, I am proud to submit for the record a resolution recently passed by the New York State Legislature marking Yom HaShoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day in the State of New York. I offer specific praise and commendation for Senator Manfred Ohrenstein and Assemblyman Alan Hevesi who introduced this resolution and ushered it to its adoption in the New York Legislature. Assemblyman Hevesi's grandfather was the Chief Rabbi of Budapest when the Nazi's occupied Hungary.

Our remembering the horror of the Holocaust enables us to renew our commitment to preventing future genocides. This resolution reminds us that we cannot abandon the legacy of this most heinous and horrific event in human history.

Whereas, April 29, 1984, marks Yom HaShoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day; and

Whereas, This date also marks the Fortieth Anniversary of the beginning of the Nazi campaign to destroy the Hungarian Jewish Community; and

Whereas, There were some 700,000 Jews in greater Hungary at the beginning of this murderous campaign; and

Whereas, In the spring of 1944 Hungary was the only country in Europe that stood intact against the cataclysmic destruction of the Jewish world that had swept that continent; and

Whereas, The virtual Nazi occupation of Hungary in March, 1944, and the installation of the pro-Nazi Sztojay government drastically transformed the situation of the Hungarian Jews; and

Whereas, On March twenty-ninth, nineteen hundred forty-four, new anti-Jewish legislation was enacted, forcing Jews entirely out of professions, ordering the registration of their property and arranging for its almost instant appropriation, concentrating Jews in designated places, and ordering the wearing of yellow stars; and

Whereas, By the end of April, 1944, over 8,000 Jews had been arrested by the Eichmann commando and the Hungarian police; and those arrested were among the first Jewish deportees from Hungary to the Nazi death camps of Eastern Europe; and

Whereas, During April, 1944, roundups into ghettos began in the annexed provinces of Hungary: Ruthenia, upper Hungary and northern Transylvania; and

Whereas, Although the Hungarian Jewish community was the last to be attacked by Hitler it suffered the most concentrated and methodical deportation of any Jewish Community; and

Whereas, For forty-six straight days beginning on May 15, 1944, with the end of the war in sight and in full view of the world, the Nazi death machinery worked ceaselessly and murdered over 400,000 Hungarian Jews; and

Whereas, to carry out the deportations of the Jews, Eichmann divided Hungary into six zones: Zone I, Carpathians; II, Transylvania; III, northern Hungary; IV, southern Hungary east of the Danube; V, Transdanubia, including the suburbs of Budapest; VI, Budapest proper; and

Whereas, The Nazis rounded up the Jews, concentrated them within the designated zones, and deported them in rapid order, with Zones I and II cleared of nearly 290,000 Jews by June 7; 92,000 Jews deported from Zones III and IV by June 30; and a total of over 437,000 Jews including some 50,000 from Budapest deported to Auschwitz by July 7; and

Whereas, The two people who symbolize the many acts of heroism during the Holocaust in Hungary are Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg and Hanna Senesch, a 23 year old Hungarian Jew who had emigrated to Palestine; and

Whereas, Raoul Wallenberg arrived at the Swedish Mission in Budapest on July 9, 1944, and organized a rescue operation that saved tens of thousands of Jews, and disappeared in the winter of 1945; and

Whereas, Hanna Senesch parachuted into Yugoslavia in March, 1944 and made her way to Hungary to aid in the rescue of the Hungarian Jews, but was murdered by the Nazis in a Budapest prison in November, 1944; and

Whereas, Some 160,000 Jews remained in Budapest, subject to terror and murder at the hands of the Arrow Cross, suffering cold, hunger and disease in the ghetto; 20,000 died there during the winter of 1944–1945; and

Whereas, On February fourteenth, nineteen hunded forty-five, the Soviet army took Budapest and prevented the deportation to death camps of some 140,000 Jews who survived there; only some 50,000 Jews survived in the provinces; and over 450,000 Jews, 70 percent of the Jews of greater Hungary, had been deported, murdered, or had died under Nazi occupation; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this Legislative Body mark the observance of Yom HaShoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day, in New York State, the residence of the largest number of Holocaust survivors in America; and be it further

Resolved, That this Legislative Body pause in its deliberations to remember the six million Jews and the other victims annihilated by the Nazis, and the heroism of those, such as Raoul Wallenberg and Hanna Senesch, who resisted the terror of the Nazis; and be it further

Resolved, That this Legislative Body mark the Fortieth Anniversary of the beginning of the Nazi terror in Hungary; and be it further

Resolved, That the lessons of the Holocaust must be recalled, in order to ensure that there is no future genocide against any people; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this Resolution, suitably engrossed, be transmitted to the American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, the New York State Holocaust Memorial Resource Center, the New York City Holocaust Memorial Commission, and the World Federation of Hungarian Jews.●

ADOLESCENT PREGNANCY AND PARENTHOOD ACT OF 1984

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Adolescent Pregnancy and Parenthood Act of 1984. This legislation would help pregnant teenagers who decide to carry their pregnancies to term and the fathers of these babies.

In 1981, approximately 537,000 teenagers became pregnant and carried their pregnancies to term; 197,000 of these teenage births were to mothers under the age of 18.

The consequences of early childbearing are generally adverse and often long lasting. Moreover, these consequences affect not only the young mothers and children, but also the fathers and their families.

Babies born to teenage mothers are much more likely to die in the first year of life than those born to mothers over the age of 20. Maternal mortality and morbidity, and the risk of having a low-birth-weight infant are also considerably greater among teenage mothers.

One of the most far-reaching consequences of teenage childbearing, however, is the truncation of education among both young parents, often resulting in a limitation of opportunities for these teenagers to gain the skills necessary to compete in our society. Largely because of educational deficits, teenage parents are frequently unable to get decent jobs, and their family incomes tend to be much lower than those earned by other families. Furthermore, the probability is high that a teenage mother will bring up her child alone. Even if young parents do marry, teenage parents are far more likely to become divorced; their babies more likely to spend a large part of their childhood in single-parent households. Alone, with small children, little education, and few skills, it is small wonder that many teenage parents find themselves living below the designated poverty level.

Mr. Speaker, grantees under this legislation would provide pre- and postnatal care; well-child care for the infant; family planning services to prevent a repeat pregnancy; education and job counseling services; family and parenting education; and a broad range of counseling services. Furthermore, recognizing the critical role that the family can, and should, play in assisting these young people, my bill stresses the importance of family support. Finally, in view of the current fiscal realities, the Adolescent Pregnancy and Parenthood Act focuses only on the most vulnerable young people: Those who give birth under the age of 18 and have low incomes or experience other barriers to services.

The adolescent family life demonstration projects, authorized in 1981, was a broad-based piece of legislation with prevention, research, and service components. This demonstration program will expire this year, and I believe the time has come to adopt a service program which will meet the pressing needs of children who bear children.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we all agree that efforts to prevent unintended teenage pregnancy should be given high priority. However, I also believe society has an obligation to help those adolescents who choose to have their children and take on the responsibilities of parenthood at such a young age. The Adolescent Pregnancy and Parenthood Act will give these young people and their infants a chance in life, and I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this bill.●

THE SOVIET INTERCEPTION OF MAIL

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today along with 17 of my colleagues I am introducing House Concurrent Resolution 294, which memorializes the President to take up the subject of the Soviet interception of international mail with Soviet authorities. Our resolution calls on the U.S. Postal Service delegation to the Universal Postal Union Convention, to be held in Hamburg, Germany, during the months of June and July, to bring this issue before the 167 nations which are members of the UPU.

For the past year, our House Post Office and Civil Service Committee has been holding hearings on this issue. To date we have accumulated over 2,000 exhibits which document the fact that the Soviets are interfering with the international mails in a cold and calculated manner to do two things:

First, they are trying to cut the lifelines of communication between those living behind the Iron Curtain with their friends and family members on the outside of the Soviet Union.

Second, the Soviets are deriving a great deal of hard Western currency by intercepting parcels mailed to the Soviet Union, returning them with surcharges to senders under such fabricated claims such as import prohibited, when in the fact the packages were legal. These procedures force American citizens to do business with Soviet-licensed parcel agencies doing business in some 25 American cities, where patrons are required to pay service charges and duty prepaid charges often running $180 to $300 and more in order to be reasonably certain that their packages are delivered.

Many Members of Congress have already provided our committee with exhibits on our investigation. Most ethnic groups in the United States have been in communication with the committee and have also furnished proof of nondelivery of mail. We invite interested Members to join with us in this resolution in order to help resolve a problem that has existed for years, but has been fully documented only within the last few months.

The issue is an emotional one with most ethnic and religious groups not only in the Soviet Union but also here in America. I believe it is incumbent upon the House to move staunchly in annunicating its concern over their interruption of the international mails.

The United States contributes upward of three-quarters of 1 million dollars each year in support of the Universal Postal Union. I question how interested the UPU has been in responding to our concerns, let alone their interest in resolving the dilemma before them.

This resolution would put the Congress on record in this formal effort to alleviate the problems for citizens of our Nation, as well as for the 17 countries from whom we have obtained evidence of Soviet mail interference.

Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith the complete text of the resolution for the RECORD at this time:

H. CON. RES. 294

Whereas the integrity of the mail service between the United States and the Soviet Union is being called into question by postal patrons in the United States and by postal patrons of 17 other countries who assert that postal items are systematically not being delivered to selected addresses in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the Subcommittee on Postal Operations has documented these facts with over 2,000 exhibits and testimony from witnesses at hearings on this matter;

Whereas the explanations required under international law and given by the Soviet postal administration regarding the nondelivery of mail to certain addresses have consistently been untimely and inadequate;

Whereas the mail which is not being delivered typically is between family members or persons sharing a religious bond and typically consists of personal correspondence or gifts of articles for personal use;

Whereas the nondelivery of mail which is deliverable as addressed and which does not contain prohibited articles is an interference by the Soviet Union with internationally recognized human rights guaranteed to all persons by the Univeral Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the Helsinki Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe; and

Whereas the systematic exclusion of certain persons from international mail service also violates the Articles of the Constitution of the Universal Postal Union (with protocols), the general regulations of the Universal Postal Union with final protocol and annex, the Universal Postal Convention with final protocol and detailed regulations, and the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress—

(1) that the President, through the Secretary of State, should express to the Government of the Soviet Union the disapproval of the American people of the Soviet Union's—

(A) systematic nondelivery of properly addressed mail originating in the United States to the persons to whom it is addressed; and

(B) violation of the Articles of the Constitution of the Universal Postal Union (with protocols), the general regulations of the Universal Postal Union with final protocol and annex, the Universal Postal Convention with final protocol and detailed regulations, and the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe; and

(2) that, at the meeting of the Congress of the Universal Postal Union in Hamburg, Germany, from June 18 to July 27, 1984, the representatives of the United States Postal Service should—

(A) bring the Soviet Union's violations of international law governing international mail to the attention of the representatives of the member countries of the Universal Postal Union, and call upon such countries for support in encouraging the Soviet Union to respect its treaty obligations;

(B) request the Universal Postal Union to conduct an investigation of such alleged violations; and

(C) consider possible sanctions against the Soviet Union for such violations.●

CYPRUS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I join tonight with my colleagues to commemorate an ongoing tragedy in the world. In less than 3 months it will be 10 years since the Government of Turkey launched an illegal invasion of Cyprus and began an occupation over some 40 percent of the island that continues to this day.

To add insult to injury, Turkey in recent months has taken the step of making their portion of the occupied island a Republic. This provocative action has angered many in this Congress and may lead to revisions in the foreign aid proposal pending for fiscal year 1985 for Turkey.

We should be ashamed that we have allowed 10 years to go by without a resolution to this problem. We should be ashamed that to this day some 2,000 Greek Cypriots remain missing and unaccounted for—all victims of the invasion. It is a disgrace that thousands of Greek Cypriots have been made into homeless, helpless refugees on their own homeland.

Let us rededicate ourselves to the principle of working for a free and independent Cyprus where human and civil rights are respected for both communities. It is a cause that should unite both sides of the political aisle and one that should be a priority of this Congress.●

HENRY HYDE ON THE PERILS OF ISOLATIONISM

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, our colleague HENRY HYDE is one of the most eloquent speakers in the House of Representatives. And as the following article demonstrates, he is also one of the most cogent writers and thoughtful observers in the House.

From his seat on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Congressman HYDE has had substantial opportunity to observe and reflect upon the foreign policy goals of the United States, and the ways in which those goals are served—or weakened—by opinion leaders across the political spectrum.

I am convinced that no foreign policy can succeed without bipartisan support. And I am equally convinced that our Nation's foreign policy interests transcend partisan lines, when viewed with objectivity and honesty. For this reason, I enthusiastically supported the establishment of a Bipartisan National Commission on Central America. The quality of that Commission's work, the dedication of its members, and the cogency of its recommendations, reflect bipartisan cooperation at its best.

The response accorded the Kissinger Commission proposals in this Congress, at times, has reflected partisan politics at its worst.

I am deeply disturbed by the tendency some members of the liberal left have displayed to attack the President's policy for narrow domestic political gains, with little or no regard for the international and national security implications of their actions.

In his article, "A new crop of isolationists," HENRY HYDE exposes the ostrich-like assumptions and eclectic reasoning of those who would urge us away from our responsibilities as leader of the Free World, and toward a myopic isolationism. As Congressman HYDE writes, upon our emergence from World War II, our leaders, Democrats and Republicans alike, clearly understood "that America could no longer exist in splendid isolation—immune from the struggle for freedom's survival in an increasingly dangerous world."

Apparently there are some would-be leaders today who need to learn this lesson anew. I commend HENRY HYDE's article as a fine introduction to that course of study.

The article follows:

A NEW CROP OF ISOLATIONISTS

(By Henry Hyde)

Whatever the faults and follies of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman, at least they taught us that America could no longer exist in splendid isolation—immune from the struggle for freedom's survival in an increasingly dangerous world.

President Roosevelt understood that a Nazi-dominated Europe and an Asia dominated by Japan's Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere would confront the Free World—what would be left of the Free World—with an intolerable political and economic situation that would soon deteriorate into a military disaster for America.

Later, President Truman understood that communist domination of the Korean peninsula would profoundly affect a disarmed Japan, with the most serious and dangerous consequences for peace and freedom in the world.

But the lessons of history are missed by our Democratic leaders of the left, I suppose, most charitably, because they haven't read history or, perhaps having read it, have failed to understand its lessons.

The two leading candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination share a common view that we disengage from Central America—Jimmy Carter's vice president would have us walk away, while George McGovern's old campaign manager would have us run.

These political leaders have moved the center of gravity of the Democratic Party—the party of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman—leftward towards the new isolationism. They have an almost childlike faith in negotiations, unadorned by military considerations, as the best means towards peace and pluralism in the world. They believe that peace is the natural condition of society and if any conflict arises all that is required is to sit down (provided you can agree on the shape of the table) and talk about the problem and all will be well.

The dominant left establishment has another remarkable genius—the ability to create terrible political disasters and walk away unscathed and never look back.

They even transform their failures into a ratification of their skewed moral vision: Chiang Kai-shek was a corrupt warlord and Mao Tse-tung was an "agrarian reformer;" the Diem and Thieu governments of South Vietnam were corrupt despoilers of human rights while the Viet Cong were "indigenous nationalists." The consequences of this error in judgment has so far—and the final body count can never be totaled—cost 2 million Cambodian lives, and the lives of untold numbers of Vietnamese boat people who would rather risk drowning at sea or attacks by pirates than suffer the evil peace imposed by the communists. These same practitioners of selective outrage in Congress energized the drive to oust the Shah of Iran and his dreaded secret police, and in their wake? The Ayatollah and all the persecution, violence, and misery that has yet to reach its climax. The names are different, the geography changes but the value judgment is constant—the preferred tyranny is always to the left.

The left liberals in Congress are outraged by what they call right-wing death squads in El Salvador. (Of course there is a criminal element in war-torn El Salvador that indulges its peculiar sense of patriotism by assassinating political enemies, and no one can morally defend them or their crimes. But how strangely absent is any recognition, much less criticism of left-wing death squads in that bleeding country). As of March 22, assassins had killed five members of the Salvadoran constituent assembly—the equivalent of murdering 36 U.S. congressmen. Imagine if terrorists murdered 36 members of Congress—do you think there would be some concern about the identities of the assassins, their political orientation? It is surely worth noting that all five of the murdered Salvadoran assemblymen were conservative. Would you not suppose some outcry would be directed at left-wing death squads?

The cardinal error of the left in this Congress is its inability or unwillingness to take communism seriously in Central America. They perceive the enemy as Russian imperialism and they utter cliches about communism no longer being monolithic—every Marxist state a potential Titoist prize to be weaned away from the Soviets by tender loving care. They will not recognize that the enemy is a massive totalitarian force that is metastasizing in our front yard by projecting Soviet and Cuban power.

How can we sustain an interventionist posture in NATO with our 250,000 troops and in South Korea with our 30,000 troops, and in the Persian Gulf with our naval vessels and at the same time maintain an isolationist posture in Central America?

We are warned that if we continue to involve ourselves in Central America we'll have "another Vietnam" on our hands. Well, in truth there are many similarities:

The left told us the Viet Cong were indigenous insurgents, not controlled from the outside (Today there is a Soviet naval base at Cam Ranh Bay). The same charge is made in reference to El Salvador, but now, as then, the facts are different.

The left urged a "negotiated settlement with power-sharing" in Vietnam. So also in El Salvador. Have you visited the mass graves in Cambodia or the refugeee camps in Thailand or Malaysia recently?

The predictable result in Vietnam as a consequence of the sanctimony and hypocritical fastidiousness of the American antiwar left was a communist takeover, the erection of its own Gulag and the extirpation of human rights accompanied by the ongoing and incalculable loss of human lives. But where are the expressions of outrage at this Asiatic holocaust?

Where are the ringing denunciations and the pastoral letters of condemnation? The pickets at the United Nations?

Of course right-wing death squads are criminal and must be rooted out in El Salvador and everywhere else that pretends to be a democracy. But should this effort fail—an admitted evil—shall we consign the entire population of El Salvador to the Marxist-Leninists? They can then impose Soviet-Cuban-Nicaraguan communism on the 5 million suffering people of El Salvador, and then proceed with their proclaimed "revolution without frontiers" up the isthmus towards Honduras, Guatemala, and Mexico—and down to Costa Rica and Panama. Henry Kissinger told the House foreign Affairs committee that we either defend freedom now at some cost, or do it later at great cost and with direct U.S. involvement. The choice is up to this Congress and time is running out. In World War II, we enjoyed a margin for error. We had time to gear up the arsenal of democracy. We no longer have that margin for error.

I suggest to our righteous friends of the left that the price for selling out Central America is not merely the extinction of democracy in the region and the Sovietization of the Caribbean, but a direct and fearful threat to our own national security. We will then be forced to respond by giving the Soviets their greatest foreign-policy triumph—the redeploying of our troops out of Europe and Korea and into this hemisphere.

And, never forget, there is one thing at which the communists excel—the creation of refugees. I trust our congressional leaders are planning to deal with the human tidal wave of refugees that will stream up the Central-American land bridge into Texas and California.

I must ask, are the political satisfactions of attacking the Reagan administration's foreign policy worth the price of selling out any chance at democracy and freedom in Central America?●

T. C. AND JOHN ED—THEIR RECENT MOVE HAS NOT CHANGED THEIR CLASS OF COMEDY

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, to possess the quality of truly having a good sense of humor is rare among individuals today. I would like to take this opportunity to recognize two individuals who have continued to keep thousands of Alabamians laughing with their morning radio program.

Following is an article that appeared in the Western Star which I would like to share with colleagues in the House of Representatives about my friends T. C. and John Ed:

T. C. AND JOHN ED—THEIR RECENT MOVE HAS NOT CHANGED THEIR CLASS OF COMEDY

What is it with T.C. and John Ed? The sillier they get, the more they laugh at each other, and the more they laugh at each other, the more the audience seems to love it.

"If they think you're funny, and they're having fun, then they're more likely to keep you around," T.C. says about the audience they attract. "We just try to be part of the family."

Since their recent move from a top forty pop radio station to a country music format, the calls that they receive would seem to indicate that a large part of their audience is willing to follow them around the dial to hear them being silly.

T.C. prods the caller with the question—"Were you already listening or did you switch with us?; "I switched." "Well bless you're heart." he replies. And so it goes throughout the morning.

Now going out on two stations, WVOK AM and WQUS FM, they have twice the space to fool around on each morning. A lot of times it's just random conversation between the two when they're on the air, but it can often be hilarious.

"We have to ad-lib," T.C. says. "I'd be scared to write it down. Once we say it then it's too late to go back."

How would they describe the type of show they do? "We specialize in low class," T.C. says. "That's because we have no class", John Ed returns. "You would think a 54 year old man would get a job that he'd be proud to tell his 2 year old granddaughters about," T.C. adds.

When they do take a minute to be serious they say they're very happy with their recent move. "The response has been excellent," said T.C. "We just felt like we were going in different directions at the other station, but it was home and there weren't any hard feelings when we left."

"There's limited interest in a.m. and we have a lot more coverage and power here. These are the main reasons we made the move. Besides, we'll do anything for a dollar, we're just doing it now for a larger audience."

In the process, they're trying to tone down the twangy guitar image of country music on their show by playing a lot of crossover material and some top forty. "We want to be able to please our old audience as well as the one we inherited," T.C. says.

But after just a few minutes of serious talk, the conversation in the booth once again returns to foolishness as they talk about the nine years they've been together.

T.C. says he first chose John Ed as a partner because he felt sorry for him. "He had never really done anything with his life." "Yeah, well I've really made something of myself now, hun." John Ed replies. "When I first hooked up with you I knew I'd gone as far as I was going to go." "Yeah, but it was a challenge," T.C. says. "It's a challenge getting up the guts to come in every morning."

These two individuals are a credit to the community and the radio industry. It takes a great deal of nerve to entertain others with humor. I have enjoyed knowing both of these fine gentlemen for many years and wish both of them the very best in all future endeavors.●

HON. MATTHEW F. McHUGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1984

● Mr. McHUGH. As you know, Mr. Speaker, April 24 marked the 69th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, an event which began on the evening of April 24, 1915, and ended only some 8 years later after the deaths of more than 1 million men, women, and children. It is therefore appropriate to remember and honor these victims, not only to remind us of their brutal fate but also to strengthen our resolve that never again shall such slaughters be allowed.

The tragedy that befell the Armenian people between 1915 and 1923 was only a beginning, of course. As Armenians recovered from the shock of their near annihilation and deportation from their homeland, they found themselves dispersed throughout the world, largely forgotten. Soon, however, the spirit of the Armenian people revived. April 24 became a rallying point, a day of commemoration for the victims and a day of renewal for the survivors and their descendants.

Although the Armenian genocide was ignored for decades by those who had not been touched first-hand by the events that had taken place between 1915 and 1923, efforts to ignore a tragedy of this dimension could never succeed. Thus, in time, religious, and political leaders throughout the world began to participate in the commemorative events of April 24. Their participation was a message that the world could not afford to forget the tragedy that had been perpetrated against the Armenian people.

Even today there are those within Turkey and within our own Government who would have us ignore the Armenian genocide. Some would have us rewrite history while others would be content to have us forget history, but clearly their efforts are doomed to failure.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the past is prolog, prolog to the continuing stream of history. As we look back over the course of events, we must also look forward in the firm belief that by our actions we can affect future events. In looking back across the years to the tragedy that befell the Armenian people, we must look forward as well in order to prevent a repetition of their calamity. For we can draw a direct parallel between the massive genocides of this century and the savage acts of terrorism that plague us today. Both involve violence against innocent people, and both reveal an alarming contempt for human life.

By any standard the massacre of over 1 million Armenians was one of the most callous and barbarous acts ever committed by one people against another. In the end, however, the continuing significance of the Armenian genocide lines not only in the physical history of the events that took place between 1915 and 1923, but also in the symbolic nature of such indiscriminate slaughter.

Thus, even as we honor the victims of this genocide, we must do more. If the brutality committed against the Armenian people is to have a lasting effect, the Armenian genocide must become not only a tug on our heart strings but a call to conscience and a call to action against terrorism around the world. In that sense, Mr. Speaker, the Armenian genocide speaks to us across the decades.●

A HUMANE DEPORTATION BILL

HON. GERRY SIKORSKI

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Speaker, as the following article from the April 2, 1984, edition of the St. Paul Dispatch makes clear, refugees from El Salvador seeking asylum in this country are faced with a serious and disheartening dilemma. These individuals have fled an unlivable situation in their homeland and come to the United States seeking the spirit of human rights that serves as the foundation of American life. Upon arrival, however, they are confronted by an unsympathetic administration which will not extend them the same voluntary departure conditions it does refugees from other nations. As the following editorial points out, it is time for us to recognize that an injustice is being done and to take action.

[From the St. Paul Dispatch, Apr. 2, 1984]

A HUMANE DEPORTATION BILL

A 26-year-old Salvadoran national with the assumed name of Rene Hurtado is living illegally in the Twin Cities. St. Luke Presbyterian Church in Wayzata has been providing him sanctuary since December 1982.

Another young Salvadoran with the assumed name of Manuel is living illegally in Minnesota with the help of the Twin Cities Friends Meeting.

Each once served in the Salvadoran army and fled the country. Manuel says his father and brother were killed by the death squads. Both Manuel and Mr. Hurtado fear they would be imprisoned, tortured or targeted by the death squads if they returned to their homeland.

To remain in the United States legally, without the protection of churches, the two would have to qualify for asylum by proving that they are specifically wanted by the killers. Failing that, the government would attempt to deport them back to El Salvador to an uncertain future. For many like Mr. Hurtado and Manuel, the risk of being denied asylum is terrifying and so they have sought protection from churches. The district director of immigration for the Twin Cities has referred to the churches' efforts as "nothing more than a smuggling ring."

The U.S. policy, which has seen thousands of illegal Salvadoran refugees returned to their homeland, is under increasing attack in this country, as it should be. On April 12, the U.S. House subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees and International Law will hold hearings on a bill that would place a moratorium on detentions and deportations of Salvadoran nationals. It is a disgrace that such a compassionate act has not been taken by the Reagan administration up to now. It is appalling that Congress would need to pass a law forcing the administration to do what should have been done long ago. But there may be no other choice.

There are an estimated 300,000 to 500,000 illegal Salvadoran aliens living in the United States. Many fled in search of safety, hoping not to be added to the list of 40,000 civilians killed in the civil war since 1979. Others came less out of fear than in pursuit of jobs, and their claims for protection are less pure.

A section of U.S. immigration law is designed specifically for those from troubled nations who neither desire citizenship nor qualify for asylum, which by the way is a costly and time-consuming process that the United States is ill-equipped to handle quickly. The alternative is called "extended voluntary departure." This status simply allows aliens facing danger in their home countries to remain in the United States temporarily and receive authorization to work until conditions improve at home. Natives of Ethiopia, Lebanon, Poland, Uganda and Afghanistan currently are in the United States under that program. Are the Salvadorans any less worthy of such treatment? No.

The Reagan administration has been reluctant to grant either asylum or extended voluntary departure to Salvadorans. To do so would be an admission that the U.S.-supported regime is repressive. Further, the administration worries that such a step would encourage new illegal immigration. Another reason is that State Department officials believe Salvadorans could find refuge in countries closer to their home.

Those all sound like lame and cold-hearted excuses from leaders of a nation steeped in humanitarian treatment of frightened and endangered refugees.

The Congress in 1983 passed a nonbinding resolution recommending that Salvadorans be granted temporary special protection in the United States, saying that deporting them was "creating potentially life-threatening situations for innocent nationals." However, the administration continues to deport about 100 Salvadorans a week.

The bill to be heard by the House immigration subcommittee would impose a moratorium of up to three years on deportation of displaced Salvadorans. Unquestionably, the bill should be approved and should enjoy the support of congressional delegations from Minnesota and western Wisconsin.●

WHO MAY VISIT AMERICA

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues an editorial which appeared in the Tuesday, April 24, edition of the New York Times.

The editorial examines the embarrassing policies of the State Department in barring entry to the United States to scholars, writers, and others whose political viewpoints the administration finds unsettling. Those denied visas have included Nobel laureates and internationally acclaimed writers.

Each time the State Department arbitrarily denies a visa to a foreign speaker or writer our international prestige and reputation suffers. Such actions make the United States appear hypocritical as we proclaim freedom of speech and association while at the same time prohibiting those with certain political beliefs from visiting our shores. At the same time, such policies do a serious disservice to our own citizens, denying them their first amendment rights to hear and freely associate with those who hold dissenting views.

It is past time that the laws which permit the State Department to arbitrarily exclude foreign visitors on the basis of their ideology were reformed. As the editorial mentions, our colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FRANK), has introduced legislation that would revise the current exclusionary sections of the Immigration and Nationality Act by substituting language that examines a visa applicant's behavior rather than the applicant's political viewpoints. I commend my colleague for his legislation and look forward to working with him to achieve its enactment.

I am sure my colleagues will find the following editorial useful in examining the need for change.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 24, 1984]

WHO MAY VISIT AMERICA

Whenever there's a rumpus about denying a visa to a controversial foreign visitor, the State Department has a standard excuse: Sorry, it's the law.

True, there is a law, the McCarran-Walter Act, which prohibits visas for aliens if, among other things, they are or were affiliated with a Communist or pro-Communist organization. It's a blunderbuss law, badly drafted and rooted in un-American practices. If the State Department were sensitive to the embarrassments it causes, and to the rights of Americans to invite foreign guests, it would press for the law's revision.

What's wrong with the law is illustrated by the confused argument over an aborted visit by Gabriel Garcia Marquez, Colombia's Nobel Prize-winning novelist. Invited to take part in a meeting critical of United States policies in Central America, he applied for a visa in Bogota on April 5. The State Department says it was ready to waive the McCarran Act restrictions, as it may, and offer him a one-year multiple-entry visitor's visa. But Mr. Garcia Marquez rejected the waiver "for reasons of principle and personal dignity," protesting being denied, over 13 years, an unconditional five-year visa.

He has been discriminated against because in the early 1960's he worked in New York for Prensa Latina, Cuba's official news agency. This put him on the blacklist, and his subsequent visits were usually by restricted visa requiring negotiations. Now he balks at negotiating and is accused of posturing, of preferring a propaganda charge to a visit.

Indeed, the novelist has a propaganda purpose. But it is not vile. To dismiss his complaint is to yield to an offensive and capricious law.

America has for too long been granting or denying visas under similarly demeaning restrictions to scores of authors, scholars and scientists. They deserve routine admission to the United States and regular contact with Americans. No other Western democracy subjects visitors to such doubt and humiliation.

A report of the New York City Bar Association sums up the padlock's illogic: "It is incongruous to exclude advocates of Communist or other ideologies when their domestic counterparts run for public office and enjoy the right of free speech, and hypocritical to do so while we boast and even preach of that domestic freedom."

Congress amended the McCarran Act in 1977 to give the executive more discretion in interpreting its restrictions. But that hasn't helped much. Representative Barney Frank, a Massachusetts Democrat, has a better idea. He would scrap the exclusionary sections and substitute new language that tests a visa applicant's behavior, not belief. His blacklist would bear the names of spies, saboteurs and terrorists, not professors and writers.

The House will hold hearings on the bill in June, but the State Department has yet to decide what it thinks. What a contrast, this delay, with its volubility in blaming the law whenever a fresh exclusion makes embarrassing headlines.●

JOINT RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1984

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, April 30, the House is scheduled to consider H.R. 5041, the Joint Research and Development Act of 1984. This legislation, by clarifying the appropriate legal standard and limiting potential antitrust liabilities, is designed to provide assistance to companies contemplating joint research and development ventures—activities that could contribute substantially to the Nation's economic health. I am pleased that we are able to act promptly on a bill that is a product of the careful work of two committees.

As the result of discussions with the Committee on Science and Technology, which reported its own version of a research and development bill in the fall of last year, we shall offer H.R. 5041 in a slightly different form than that reported by the Committee on the Judiciary on April 6.

Most of the changes in the amendment in the nature of a substitute are in the definitions set out in section 2 of the bill. In the definitions, and throughout the bill, the amended version substitutes the term "joint research and development venture" for "joint research and development program." The definition of "joint research and development venture" in section 2(a)(1) has also been slightly restructured. The only substantive change is the addition of a new clause (C), providing that "engineering activities to achieve standards of performance and reliability or to meet economic requirements" will fall within the joint R&D definition.

In section 2(b), the exclusionary language in the definition of joint R&D has been modified. In clause (C), the words "neither developed by such venture nor integrally related to a product or process developed by such venture" have been substituted for "not jointly developed." This change insures that a product or process whose development is integrally related to the joint venture's activities will still fall within the definition of joint R&D.

The changes to sections 3 through 6 of the bill are largely technical and conforming in nature. In subsections (a) and (b) of section 4, the phrase "in lieu of the relief specified in such section" is added. This phrase makes clear the intent to eliminate the threefold damage remedy specified in section 4 and section 4(C) of the Clayton Act in favor of the actual damage remedy specified in H.R. 5041.

Subsection 4(e) has been amended to provide that the protections of section 4 shall lapse only during the effective period of a court order enjoining protected conduct.

Section 6(a) has been amended to make clear in the last sentence that voluntary additional disclosure notifications will serve "to extend the protections of section 4."

Section 6(d) has been amended to eliminate the phrase suggesting that notifications withdrawn prior to publication in the Federal Register "shall have no force and effect." Such withdrawn notifications will continue to enjoy the protections against disclosure provided by section 6. The amended language simply provides that any such withdrawn notification "shall not confer the protections of section 4 on any persons with respect to whom" it was filed.

The amended version of H.R. 5041 is appended to this statement.

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) Notwithstanding any applicable provision of any State law providing a damage remedy for conduct similar to that forbidden by the antitrust laws, any person who is entitled to recovery on a claim under such provision shall not recover in excess of the actual damages sustained by him, interest calculated at the rate specified in section 1961 of title 28, United States Code, on such actual damages as specified in subsection (d), and the cost of suit attributable to such claim, including a reasonable attorney's fee pursuant to section 5 of this Act—

(1) if such claim results from conduct that is within the scope of a joint research and development venture for which notification has been filed under section 6(a) of this Act, and

(2) if such claim is filed after a notice of the research and development venture is published in the Federal Register as provided in section 6(b) of this Act.

(d) Interest shall be awarded on the damages involved for the period beginning on the date of filing of the claim and ending on the date of judgment, unless the court finds that the award of all or part of such interest is unjust in the circumstances. Interest shall be awarded on the damages involved for the period beginning on the date of injury and ending one day prior to the date of filing of the claim if the court finds that the award of all or part of such interest is just in the circumstances.

(e) The protections of this section shall not apply to any conduct that occurs during the effective period of any court order enjoining such conduct as a result of a claim under the antitrust laws or any State law similar to the antitrust laws.

ATTORNEY'S FEES

SEC. 5. Notwithstanding section 4, 4C, or 16 of the Clayton Act, in any claim under the antitrust laws, or any State law similar to the antitrust laws, based on conduct that results from a joint research and development venture, the court shall, at the conclusion of the action, award to the substantially prevailing party the cost of suit attributable to such claim, including a reasonable attorney's fee. In the interest of justice, the award may be reduced or withheld and may be reduced by an award in favor of any other party for any part of the cost of suit attributable to such claim, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

DISCLOSURE OF JOINT RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT VENTURE

SEC. 6. (a) In accordance with rules issued by the Attorney General in consultation with the Commission, any person who is a party to a joint research and development venture may file simultaneously with the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission a written notification disclosing—

(1) the identities of the parties to such venture, and

Any person who is a party to such venture may file such additional disclosure notifications pursuant to this section as are appropriate to extend the protections of section 4.

Prior to its publication, the contents of the notice shall be made available to the parties to such venture.

(c) Except as to the information published in the Federal Register pursuant to subsection (b), all information and documentary material submitted as part of a notification filed pursuant to this section and all other information obtained by the Attorney General or the Commission in the course of any investigation or enforcement action shall be exempt from disclosure under section 552 of title 5, United States Code, and shall not be made publicly available by any agency of the United States to which section 552 applies.

(d) Any person who has filed a notification pursuant to this section may withdraw such notification prior to the time at which notice of such research and development venture is published in the Federal Register. Any notification so withdrawn shall not be subject to subsection (b) and shall not confer the protections of section 4 on any person with respect to whom such notification was filed.

(e) Any action taken or not taken by the Attorney General or the Commission with respect to notifications filed pursuant to this section, shall not be subject to judicial review.

(f) For the sole purpose of establishing that a person is entitled to the protections of section 4, the fact of disclosure of conduct under section 6(a) and the fact of publication of a notice under section 6(b) shall be admissible into evidence. But no action by the Attorney General or the Commission taken pursuant to this section shall be admissible into evidence in any administrative or judicial proceeding for the purpose of supporting or answering any claim under the antitrust laws, or under any State law similar to the antitrust laws.

(g) The rules promulgated under this section shall be subject to the public notice and comment requirements of section 553 of title 5, United States Code.●

SUPER MISSILES: THEIR RELATIONSHIP TO MILITARY SECURITY AND ARMS CONTROLS

HON. ALBERT GORE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, it often seems as if the race between weapons technology and sound decisionmaking is entirely one-sided. Time and again we find that our ability to do ever more clever, thought not necessasrily ever more intelligent, things with weaponry has developed far in front of our understanding of the policy and political implications of these matters. Often, the roots of tomorrow's great public disagreements over nuclear weapons policy and arms control can only be found in today's esoteric research work. We become alert to the policy dimensions of these developments ordinarily only after technology presents us with an accomplished fact. By then, it is almost too late for calm deliberation.

We have, however, an opportunity to get ahead of one oncoming issue: the issue of super-accurate ballistic missiles and their relationship to military security and to arms control. Oncoming U.S. ballistic missile systems such as the MX are going to be quite accurate, as the result of steady improvements in inertial guidance systems. But beyond these systems, there is the possibility of refining accuracy almost to the point of perfection through active terminal guidance—a final steering of reentry vehicles to compensate for all previous errors. The name for this technology is MaRV—(for Maneuverable Reentry Vehicle)—and it is basically a gleam in the eye of some officials at the Pentagon, at this stage of the game.

Super accuracy would make silo-basing of missiles completely obsolete. Many of us would assume that silos are already moribund as a concept in the absence of arms control arguments focused on stability. There is, however, research going on that suggests the possibility of increasing silo and weapons hardness to levels previously thought out of the question. Should technology for superhardening prove fruitful, then silo basing could have a new lease on life. That would be an important development both from the point of view of stability and of costs in sustaining a deterrent. But no amount of hardening can survive a direct nuclear hit, and that is the kind of accuracy that terminally guided MaRV can bring about.

Clearly, we could face a situation in which there is a fundamental choice to be made: shall we seek to eliminate any chance the Soviets might have for basing their missiles securely in super hardened silos—by MaRVing our missiles—if that means that we too will lose a second chance for viable silos—for the Soviets will surely follow with their own MaRV—or should we settle for mutual stability?

These issues, though relatively far in the future, were made real to me by articles in Aviation Week pointing out an interest in the Pentagon in proceeding with MaRV for the new single-warhead ICBM as well as perhaps the MX. I wrote to the Secretary of the Air Force expressing my concerns, and have had in return what I consider to a sensible and constructive response, which defines an intelligent approach to the issue. This exchange of correspondence does not settle the MaRV issue, but it does represent a sound beginning to a dialog. Therefore, I am pleased to submit it for the RECORD, for the consideration of my colleagues and the public:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D.C.,
March 15, 1984.

Hon. VERNE ORR,
Secretary of the Air Force,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I know that you agree with me that the Scowcroft Commission Report and all that has followed it represent an important achievement. In particular, despite the intense controversy surrounding the MX, it seems to me that the Report's general proposition about strategic stability, and its specific recommendation for a small single-warhead ICBM enjoy broad support.

This is not to say that the "Midgetman" idea is assured a smooth passage. During the years ahead, this system will have to pass a series of hurdles—both technological and political. Not only first-rate management will be required, but also a high order of statesmanship, including a sense of fidelity to the basic logic of the Scowcroft Commission Report.

That is why I am writing to you, to express concerns aroused by recent items in the press suggesting that the Midgetman is viewed in the Pentagon as a weapon that must achieve super-accuracy through MaRVing, or fail in its objectives. I understand the argument which calls for the Midgetman to be no less accurate than the on-coming state of the art in the MX. Achieving even that will be a major challenge, especially if the missile's costs are to be kept under control, and its development not to be unduly drawn out. To insist on going even further in a search for virtually perfect accuracy, would risk making the Midgetman unrealizable at costs and in a time frame that serve the country's needs.

Like a number of other members of Congress, I am paying close attention to the early, experimental work DoD is doing on "super-hardening" of silos. Most of us hope that if this technology works out, it could offer the prospect of regaining security for ICBM forces, of reducing the pressure for unprecedented progress in developing a mobile hardened launcher for Midgetman, and in freeing up the arms control process. Should the same technology afford a degree of sanctuary to the Soviets, that is by no means a necessarily bad development assuming that we are seeking mutually stable forces. While I can understand that this possibility engages the attention of planners whose job it is to think about overcoming super-hardness with super-accuracy, it is also something that must engage the attention of those concerned with arms control.

Similarly, I am aware of concerns in some parts of the government about the possibility of a Soviet ARM "break-out" and the relationship between this and the idea of MaRVing. Once again, however, it seems to be that this is a matter that must be dealt with vigorously from the arms control perspective, in hopes of preserving the ABM Treaty from developments on either side that might undermine it.

I would urge, therefore, that Midgetman not be comingled and confused with MaRV, and that in any event, we analyze and debate the MaRV question from the broadest possible perspective.

Sincerely,

ALBERT GORE, Jr.,
Member of Congress.

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
Washington, D.C., April 9, 1984.

Hon. ALBERT GORE, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. GORE: I appreciate you sharing your concerns about the technology development for maneuvering reentry vehicles (MaRVs) and welcome the opportunity to explain the work underway in this area. Recent press reports have tended to confuse the purpose and nature of the development efforts. MaRVs are not part of the baseline for either the Peacekeeper or the small missile system. Our plan is to employ the MK21 RV, a non-MaRV system, on both the Peacekeeper and the small missile.

Before addressing this issue in more detail, let me say that the Air Force is fully committed to implementing the ICBM Modernization Program proposed by the Scowcroft Commission, endorsed by the President, and approved by Congress. As you correctly pointed out, it represents an important achievement, particularly in providing the basis for a national consensus on ICBM modernization and arms control.

To that end, Peacekeeper production is underway. Deployment is on schedule and within projected costs. We are confident that the December 1986 initial operational capability will be met with a highly reliable system contrary to the report prepared by the House Appropriations Committee's Survey and Investigation Team. Progress is also being made in follow-on basing technology development efforts with potential applicability for both Peacekeeper and the Small ICBM. We are encouraged about the results thus far in silo superhardening technology. Scaled tests have demonstrated that it is possible to achieve levels of hardness 25 times greater than that of existing Minuteman silos, with promise for even greater hardness. Larger scaled tests are planned for the future, along with tests to increase hardness from nonblast nuclear effects.

Our greatest challenge is in the development of the small mobile single warhead ICBM. The goal for the small missile system is to achieve an initial operational capability in the early 1990s at an affordable cost. To assist in this endeavor, the Small Missile Independent Advisory Group, under the leadership of Bernard A. Schriever, was appointed last fall to recommend a management approach and acquisition strategy. The Group recommended the competitive development of all missile subsystems to introduce innovative ideas early in the process, reduce the costs, and minimize the technical risks.

The Group identified guidance and control as the greatest technical challenge for the small missile in a mobile configuration. They recommended competitive development of alternative systems to achieve requisite accuracy, including a lightweight Advanced Inertial Reference Sphere, ring laser gyroscopes, stellar inertial systems, Global Positioning Satellite receivers, and MaRVs, possibly with terminal fix systems. The Air Force has begun concept development in all of these areas. As with all the missile subsystems, contractors are being advised that when full scale development and force structure decisions are made in the latter part of the decade, the cost must be reasonable and affordable.

With respect to MaRVs in particular, they are not presently needed to satisfy the requirements for the small missile system against projected Soviet threats. They could become useful to evade possible future Soviet antiballistic missile defenses and to gain increased accuracy. The potential advantage of terminal guidance and evasion maneuvers, particularly in the event of a Soviet ABM breakout or if further Soviet hardening of critical targets negates the effectiveness of purely ballistic systems, make continued research on MaRVs prudent as a hedge against these possibilities. To the extent that we pursue MaRV technology in the future, it will be funded under a separate program entitled "Advanced Strategic Missile Systems." Of course, we believe any future decision to deploy MaRVs, should the threat warrant, will be a National decision—made in full consultation with Congress.

Additionally, MaRVs could very well be included in future arms control negotiations. As the President has stated, everything is on the negotiating table. In the meantime, it is important for us to negotiate from a position of strength and for the Soviets to know that we are prepared with viable options.

We appreciate your support for the ICBM Modernization Program and look forward to your continued cooperation as we work together to enhance deterrence and stability.

Sincerely,

VERNE ORR,
Secretary of the Air Force.●

1984 LEGISLATIVE QUESTIONNAIRE

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the results of my 1984 congressional questionnaire indicate that citizens of Wisconsin's Third Congressional District believe that the most important economic issues facing our Nation are Government spending and the deficit.

When asked where spending should be cut, 59 percent said they favored cuts in foreign aid, 51 percent said defense spending should be cut and 33 percent supported cuts in domestic social programs. Only 2 percent said no spending cuts should be made.

On the question of raising taxes, 25 percent said no new taxes should be enacted, but a resounding 69 percent favored raising revenue by closing tax loopholes.

In these days when we face difficult questions in Central America, 41 percent of my constituents responding to our survey believe our role should include a combination of military and economic assistance while 29 percent prefer economic aid with no military assistance.

Responding to the question of arms negotiations, only 13 percent said the United States should reduce weapons regardless of what the Soviets do, while the vast majority said arms reductions should be on an equal and verifiable basis.

In other areas, a majority of citizens in the Third District favor the equal rights amendment. And given the options of keeping the current dairy diversion program, moving to strict production controls, or eliminating the Government role, the majority favored eliminating Federal Government involvement in dairy agriculture.

YOUTH UNEMPLOYMENT: STILL A NATIONAL DISASTER

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, a recent Gallup poll conducted for Newsweek magazine showed that most Americans still see unemployment as the most pressing issue of the day. For the young people of our country in particular, there is a good explanation for this. Unemployment for this group has risen, rather than fallen, during the past month.

For the month of March, the unemployment rate for youth climbed to 19.9 percent, which approached the December 1983 level; 55,000 more youth than in February, or approximately one out of every five teenagers, was unable to find work last month. For black and Hispanic teenagers, the jobless rate was higher in March 1984 than in March 1983, near the depth of the last recession. Black youth unemployment, which, at 46.7 percent is over 2.5 times higher than white youth unemployment—17.1 percent—has remained near 50 percent for over a year. However, because of extremely low youth labor market participation rates—in 1983, 36.4 percent for black teens and 56.9 percent for white teens—these numbers grossly understate the true youth unemployment figure. Discouraged by the lack of employment opportunities, youth choose to drop out of the labor force. These statistics serve as further evidence of what has been painfully clear to many Americans of all description: our decelerating economic recovery has yet to reach significant segments of the involuntarily unemployed and, more frighteningly, it may never reach them.

While it is clear that the latest recession has made it difficult for youth in the private sector, the existing employment programs in the public sector are also unable to cope with this problem. The Job Training Partnership Act program severely restricts the use of funds for work experience, which is essential to youth for success in the labor market. Of even more importance, however, is the reduction in JTPA funding programs which effect youth under the Reagan administration, which has rendered ineffective our efforts in this area. Clearly, part of the problem of youth unemployment is our lack of tools to reduce it.

Seventy cosponsors have joined me in introducing legislation to combat the problem of youth unemployment. H.R. 5017, the Youth Incentive Employment Act, is designed to simultaneously provide jobs for youth and encourage them to obtain the basic education and training needed to improve their long-term employment prospects. The proposal is based on the successful implementation of a 30-month demonstration project mandated by Congress as part of the Youth Act of 1977. It will provide part-time employment during the school year and full-time employment during the summer for economically disadvantaged youth between the ages of 16 and 19. To participate in the program, these youth must be members of families whose income does not exceed 70 percent of the Bureau of Labor Statistics' lower living standard, and must agree to resume or maintain attendance in secondary school or an alternative education program and work toward acquiring a high school diploma or its equivalent.

Under this Act, $2 billion for fiscal year 1985, and such sums thereafter, would be authorized to subsidize, up to 100 percent, the employment of approximately 1-million participants. Eligible youth would be employed under strict supervision in public agencies, private non-profit organizations, and by private for-profit employers, and would have to maintain performance standards at school and at the worksite. If enacted, the Youth Incentive Employment Act would encourage the completion of school, provide training opportunities, and help develop a responsible, productive attitude toward work in our Nation's youth.

The first budget resolution passed by the House provides authority for youth employment initiatives such as the Youth Incentive Employment Act. This authority clears the way for Congress to act this session to bring down the explosive rates of youth unemployment. I have scheduled hearings on this act on May 1 and May 3. My good friend, Senator EDWARD KENNEDY, has introduced a companion bill in the Senate.

Our inclusion of the language for a youth initiative in the House budget resolution highlights our shared awareness of the seriousness of the youth unemployment problem. H.R. 5017, the Youth Incentive Employment Act, is the best mechanism for dealing with this problem. I urge all my colleagues, to support it.●

THE ST. PETERSBURG TIMES HONORED NATIONALLY

HON. C. W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the St. Petersburg Times, the largest newspaper in my district, celebrates its 100th anniversary this year, and I am pleased to note that Time magazine has just rated it as one of America's 10 best daily newspapers for providing excellence in journalism.

The first issue of the Times, then a weekly newspaper, was published July 25, 1884, and had its office in the backroom of a small drugstore. Today, the Times has grown to be the second largest newspaper in the Southeastern United States with a daily circulation of 250,000 and a Sunday circulation of 314,000. More than 1,300 full-time and 1,400 part-time employees are involved in the day-to-day operation of the newspaper in its two main buildings and its bureaus scattered throughout the State of Florida. The Times also has one of the most active Washington bureaus which provides detailed coverage of our Nation's Capital for Florida readers.

The Times has received many national honors in the past including two Pulitzer Prizes for distinguished public service. The newspaper is regarded as one of the most technically advanced in our Nation with an outstanding staff of photographers and artists. The Times' graphics are extremely descriptive and provide a tremendous supplement to the stories they accompany.

While it is no secret that I have occasionally had strong philosophical differences with the Times, and I am sure we will continue to have those differences from time to time, I am pleased to take this opportunity today to congratulate the entire staff of the St. Petersburg Times for their efforts which have resulted in this deserved national recognition from Time magazine.●

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1984

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, the people of Cyprus have earned the respect and sympathy of the American people during the tragedy of civil conflict and occupation during the past 10 years.

The continued occupation of the northern third of the island by Turkey violates international law and the integrity of Cyprus. It has drawn the justified condemnation of the free world.

The tragedy for Cyprus was compounded in November when the Turkish-Cypriot community declared occupied Cyprus an independent republic.

The fundamental position of the Congress and the American Government must continue to be that the occupation by Turkey and the unilateral declaration of an independent republic are illegal.

The policy of providing military assistance to Turkey in the hope that it would encourage the Turkish Government to end occupation and to work toward a peaceful resolution of the conflict with Greece over Cyprus has been a failure.

I have opposed a policy of military aid to Turkey under both Republican and Democratic administrations. I have done so because I must oppose aid to a government which would persist in an illegal occupation of another country. The continuing conflict over Cyprus which has been a tragedy for the Cypriot people has direct—and negative—consequences for U.S. strategic interests in the Mideast.

The House should vote to withhold already authorized aid for Turkey until it agrees to withdraw from the northern portion of Cyprus.

The United States must refuse to provide the means by which Turkey can continue an occupation which violates the integrity of Cyprus, compromises the rights of the Greek minority on Cyprus, and ultimately weakens the ability of the NATO alliance to defend the interests of the Western democracies.

We should realize that only a hardheaded approach on the question of military aid to Turkey will provide a realistic incentive for the Government of Turkey to end its illegal, shortsighted policy.●

THE CRUCIAL IMPORTANCE OF THE WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, our former distinguished colleague in the Senate and my good friend, Senator Jacob Javits, along with our late distinguished Foreign Affairs Committee chairman, Clement J. Zablocki, have long been recognized as the chief architects of the War Powers Resolution. This has been recently demonstrated by Senator Javits' article in the New York Times on this important subject.

The War Powers Resolution has played a crucial role in helping to restore Congress preponderant role under the Constitution in the decision to commit troops into hostilities and in restraining ill-conceived foreign interventions without the support of the Congress and the American people.

Unfortunately, in the aftermath of the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Lebanon, this administration has sought to blame the Congress and the War Powers Resolution for a failed foreign policy.

As Senator Javits accurately points out, it was in part the administration's failure to comply fully with the War Powers Resolution that led to subsequent arguments over the mission of the U.S. marines and undermined solid support and willing cooperation between the Congress and the President. When fully complied with, Senator Javits correctly argues that the War Powers Resolution results in the collective judgment of Congress and the President concerning the decision to enter into hostilities and is therefore a great source of strength.

Mr. Speaker, the War Powers Resolution continues to play an important role in fostering and preserving the responsibilities of the Congress in foreign and defense policy. I commend to my colleagues Senator Javits' article regarding the effectiveness of the resolution.

[From the New York Times, Mar. 16, 1984]

CONGRESS' CRUCIAL WAR ROLE

(By Jacob K. Javits)

America has suffered a serious disappointment in Lebanon, raising questions about our decision to station marines in Beirut. It would, however, be a grave mistake to seek to use this as a reason for excluding Congress from a role in such decisions. Yet Secretary of State George P. Shultz has virtually suggested that.

The fact is that restraint on the President's power to commit troops to the equivalent of war is incorporated in the War Powers Resolution of 1973. That act gives a vital measure of security to our people, a crucial check on the use of our armed forces. It requires, in effect, a collective judgment by both the President and Congress before we take steps that could lead us into war. United States involvement—direct or indirect—in military activities in Central America, in the Persian Gulf and perhaps tomorrow in other places makes this a particularly vital question now.

We had every right to hope that this Administration would comply with the War Powers Resolution. Certainly, the agreement between the President and Congress to send marines to Lebanon for 18 months seemed to indicate that it would. But the President raised questions about this compliance even in signing the measure, reserving his alleged right to commit our armed forces in other international crises. And now we find that this may have been more than just a legalistic reservation: It may have been a statement of policy. This is a critical question, which should not be swept under the rug or left in limbo.

On March 2, Mr. Shultz—for whom I have great respect—told the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations that the invocation of the War Powers Resolution "totally took the rug out from under our diplomatic effort" in Lebanon. He questioned "whether that piece of legislation is the most desirable way to structure the interaction between the legislative and executive branches for dealing with issues involving force." And he called for a review of the resolution.

Changing history often calls for a review of legislation. But Mr. Shultz's charges do not, I believe, give adequate consideration to either the nature of the president's power as Commander in Chief or the importance of Congressional participation in decisions about the commitment of troops abroad. It is the latter that should disturb the American people most.

Let us remember that the Constitution gives Congress—and Congress alone—the power "to declare war." Yet, until the resolution came along in 1973, there was practically no means by which the people could restrain the President's power as Commander in Chief to commit the nation to war by committing troops.

In fact, subsequent events in Lebanon very much justified the invocation of the War Powers Resolution. To begin with, the time limitations in the resolution committing marines to Lebanon were more than justified. A multinational force was indeed a proper instrument to help bring about the removal of all foreign forces and foster national reconciliation. But the marines' participation in such a force should have been limited to six months. Many in both the House and the Senate were inclined to impose such a limit, but they agreed to accept a limit of 18 months in order to win the President's agreement. This now looks like a mistake.

In fact, six months would have been just the right amount of time: We could have withdrawn in an orderly fashion in November after President Amin Gemayel convened the first meeting, in Geneva, to effect a national reconciliaton. Instead, we waited to withdraw until civil war broke our again in early February and our pullback was widely seen as a success for the Syrians.

Besides, a less equivocal accord between Congress and the Administration might have assured a much happier outcome. In this, too, the quibbling over the time limit was very destructive. As soon as it became clear that the Geneva conference had failed and the Lebanese Army began to disintegrate along religious factional lines, Congress's latent resentment—the residue of the Administration's reluctance to cooperate fully on the War Powers Resolution—boiled over. Subsequent arguments over the imprecise definition of the marines' mission rocked the country and added to our inability to deal effectively with the situation by bringing our power to bear on the Syrians.

What does this experience teach us? It demonstrates that in crises like Lebanon, solid alignment and willing cooperation between the Administration and Congress is vital to effective policy. The War Powers Resolution, rather than being a drag on our policy, can be a great source of strength. It is not necessary for a great power to win all battles. It is only necessary to show the ability to act with national unity and effectiveness.●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE HONORABLE CARMINE J. PERRAPATO, ESTEEMED CHIEF OF POLICE OF GARFIELD, N.J., 1984 "MAN OF THE YEAR" BOYS CLUB OF GARFIELD

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, May 5, the residents of Garfield, county of Bergen, and State of New Jersey will join together in testimony to an esteemed chief of police, outstanding community leader and good friend—the Honorable Carmine J. Perrapato—whose standards of excellence throughout his lifetime have earned him the most highly coveted distinguished citizen's award of the Boys Club of Garfield—the Man of the Year. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our warmest greetings and felicitations to Chief Perrapato and share the pride of his wife Josephine and their family upon his receiving this citation of merit for leadership endeavors on behalf of our young people.

Mr. Speaker, the Boys Club of Garfield is one of our Nation's most prestigious affiliates of the Boys Club of America. We are all familiar with the noble traditions of the Boys Clubs of America and their outstanding public service to the people of our Nation in helping our young men to achieve leadership qualities of self-reliance, character building, sportsmanship, fair play, and eagerness to serve others. Their deeply committed endeavors in exercising measures to keep America beautiful and attain greater communion and understanding in friendship and goodwill among all mankind are a significant investment in the enrichment and excellence of the quality of our way of life here in America.

Carmine J. Perrapato has by his example and lifetime of dedication to these same true American ideals personified exemplary leadership in his outstanding responsible service to our people which has truly enriched our community, State and Nation.

Our man of the year Carmine has indeed earned the highest respect and esteem of all of us for his outstanding public service in his law enforcement career, placing other above self in providing safety in the streets, security in the home, and optimum public safety for all of our people. He has been chief of police for the city of Garfield since 1959 and has forged ahead with dedication, devotion, and sincerity of purpose in combating crime and protecting the life of the people of our community. We applaud his knowledge, training, hard work, and personal commitment that has enabled him to achieve the fullest confidence and strongest support of the people of Garfield. He has always applied the most sophisticated and advanced techniques of his profession.

Carmine Perrapato is a graduate of William Paterson College with a B.S. degree in administration and masters degree in education. He was a highly respected member of the faculty of Bergen Community College and is president of the board of education.

Chief Perrapato has been a staunch supporter and active participant in many civic community improvement programs. He has been chairman of the United Way for the city of Garfield for the past 18 years and has reached its quota for 15 of the 18 years. In addition to the Garfield Boys Club, he is an active member in many worthwhile charitable and benevolent organizations including the Girls Club, Red Cross, United Way, Bergen County Narcotics Force, State & County Police Chief's Association, and the State Drug Abuse Council.

Mr. Speaker, the fulfillment of the purpose, goals, and aims of the Boys Clubs of America could not be achieved without the leadership of people like Chief Carmine J. Perrapato and the strong team effort of volunteer and professional leaders of our communities who participate unselfishly and willingly of their busy schedules in passing these sterling traditions along to our youth of America.

It is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to call your attention to this year's recipient of an award of excellence that expresses appreciation for the untiring, unselfish, herculean efforts of a highly compassionate individual. We do indeed salute an outstanding individual, esteemed chief of police and great American—the Boys Club of Garfield's Man of the Year—the Honorable Carmine J. Perrapato.●

LOOPHOLE OF THE WEEK

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, some recent evidence released by the Internal Revenue Service has prompted supply siders to take to the streets and proclaim the effectiveness of the 1981 tax cut. The IRS figures show that the share of total taxes paid by the wealthy has increased while the share for the less wealthy had declined. One Representative saw these figures and suggested: "These figures prove what we have argued all along. If you really want to soak the rich, as some of my liberal colleagues are always proposing, the best way to do it is to lower all tax rates, and make it more profitable for them to invest their money in profitable enterprises than to hide it in unproductive tax shelters."

The supply side analysis of this evidence is both incomplete and inaccurate. First, it neglects the tax shelters that were also created by the 1981 tax act. These shelters, which have been closed in part by TEFRA, did not have their intended effect of increasing savings and productive activity. Instead, in the wake of a boatload of new tax incentives, capital investment dropped 2 years in a row and the savings rate hit an all-time low. So, I think there is a preferable alternative to get the rich to shift their money out of hiding places in unproductive tax shelters. It is also the simplest alternative. We should eliminate the shelters themselves.

Second, if anyone is getting soaked by supply side economics, it certainly is not the rich. A closer analysis of the IRS evidence indicates, in fact, that the tax burden on those earning less than $25,000 increased in 1982. For though the amount of taxes collected declined, the amount of income earned by this category of individuals dropped even more. Thus the actual tax burden increased.

Third, the increase in taxes paid by the wealthy was not due to a burst of entrepreneurial activity, but due to an unlocking effect on capital gains investments. To quote from the Washington Post article which will be included as part of this statement: "The lower tax rate and higher after-tax gain encouraged taxpayers to sell some assets they had held for some time and might otherwise have continued to hold." There has been no rising tide that has helped the poor. The number of individuals living in poverty has jumped by millions since the Reagan administration took office.

Finally, supply siders ignore one of the worst consequences of their program, and that is the deficit problem which threatens economic recovery. Part of the solution to this problem lies not in more supply side economics but in closing tax loopholes.

I commend to my colleagues the following Washington Post article which discusses why the "Tax Cuts Aren't Working as Promised."

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 22, 1984]

TAX CUTS AREN'T WORKING AS PROMISED—IRS FIGURES FOR '82 DON'T "VINDICATE THE SUPPLY SIDERS"

(By John M. Berry)

Supply-siders jumped with glee recently when the Internal Revenue Service released preliminary statistics from 1982 individual income tax returns. The IRS figures showed that even with tax rates cut sharply for upper-bracket taxpayers, their share of total taxes went up while the share paid by lower-income individuals went down.

Because 1982 was the first year in which a significant part of the Reagan personal income tax cuts was effective, the supply-siders immediately concluded that the world was working exactly as they had predicted. Apparently lower rates were drawing the rich out of tax shelters, and encouraging them to channel more of their income into taxable investments. Crowed a Wall Street Journal editorial, "The numbers are in on 1982 and . . . they vindicate the supply-siders."

And in a column by Warren Brookes distributed by the Heritage Foundation for newspaper use, Rep. Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.), one of the original sponsors of the tax cut, was quoted as saying, "These figures prove what we have argued all along. If you really want to soak the rich, as some of my liberal colleagues are always proposing, the best way to do it is to lower all tax rates, and make it more profitable for them to invest their money in profitable enterprises than to hide it in unproductive tax shelters."

Last week some administration officials were urging that President Reagan cite the numbers in a forthcoming speech as evidence that his tax cuts were working exactly as promised, sources said.

The only problem with these claims of victory is that the evidence proves the opposite. The tax burdens of the 62 percent of all taxpayers with incomes under $25,000 went down because their incomes went down. Their taxes naturally went down, too, but by less than their incomes.

Adjusted for changes in their share of total income, the tax burden of the under-$25,000 group went up, not down, in 1982.

In addition, the figures show conclusively that the increase in income for upper-bracket taxpayers is not the result of some burst of entrepreneurial activity or of the rich getting out of tax shelters. Instead, it probably is the result of the surge in stock prices in the latter half of 1982 and a one-time "unlocking" effect on investment assets from the cut in the maximum capital gains tax rate from 28 to 20 percent.

Total reported income went up by $75 billion from 1981 to 1982, while, as a result of the tax cuts, taxes paid were virtually unchanged.

As a result probably of both inflation and the recession, actual income fell from 1981 to 1982 for taxpayers reporting less than $25,000 in adjusted gross income, or AGI. (See table below.) As a share of total reported AGI, the under-$25,000 group also suffered a decline. This group included 59 million, or 62 percent, of all taxpayers. They had 42 percent of total income.

The drop in the number of tax payers in this group is part of an ongoing trend related to rising incomes due both to inflation and an increase in real incomes. The recession and the lower rate of inflation in 1982 than in 1981 apparently slowed this movement toward higher-income categories.

At the top end of the scale, taxpayer incomes rose strongly from 1981 to 1982 almost entirely as a result of a sharp increase in reported capital gains.

A big jump in capital gains realizations can be inferred—the IRS figures included no separate data on capital gains—because of what happened to other major sources of income for the high-bracket taxpayers. The average level of interest and dividends and of business income declined for each upper-bracket income group. So did the average level of wages and salaries for those above $500,000. For other upper-bracket groups, average wages and salaries generally rose less than the rate of inflation.

With rents and royalties not significant items and partnerships undoubtedly continuing to generate tax losses as they did in 1981, the only possible reason for the increase in income shown by the upper-bracket taxpayers is an increase in capital gains realizations.

For taxpayers with AGIs above $1 million in 1981, 33.7 percent of their reported income was from capital gains. (Actual gains were much higher, because 60 percent of a gain is normally excluded from AGI.) Out of $11.1 billion in AGI reported by that group, $3.7 billion was capital gains. Another $6.5 billion came from wages and salaries, interest and dividends and business income, leaving less than $850 million from other sources.

In 1982, the AGI for the $1 million-and-up group jumped to $17.6 billion, by far the largest increase in percentage terms for any income group, and the number of returns in the group rose 55 percent. The IRS data shows that wages and salaries, interest and dividends and business income totaled $9 billion. If the remaining portion, other than capital gains, bore roughly the same relationship to the group's total AGI as it did in 1981, the other non-capital-gains income amounted to $1.3 billion.

If this conservative assumption is correct, then capital gains for this group were about $7.3 billion, or almost twice the 1981 level. The average capital gain on the returns filed by this group, according to this arithmetic, was almost $900,000, about $180,000 more than in 1981.

Because long-term capital gains, by definition, can be realized only on assets held for for one year or longer, it is not very likely that any large share of the assets sold in 1982 were purchased after the tax cuts were enacted in August 1981. In other words, the lower tax rate and higher after-tax gain encouraged taxpayers to sell some assets they had held for some time and might otherwise have continued to hold.

In such cases, the tax cut left the taxpayer with a higher after-tax gain and represented a windfall relative to what most investors would have expected when they made their investments. The investments themselves were not made as a result of the tax cut.

The other really striking story in the IRS numbers is the increase—not a decrease as claimed by the supply-siders—in the tax burdens in the under-$25,000 taxpayer group.

While total AGI was rising 4.2 percent in 1982, from $1,773 billion to $1,848 billion, that for taxpayers below the $25,000 level dropped $23 billion, or 3 percent.

Meanwhile, as that group's share of total income fell, so did its share of total taxes paid—but not by as much. The group's income share went down by 3 percentage points while its share of total taxes paid fell only 2.1 percentage points.

In other words, when 1981 and 1982 tax burdens are adjusted for changes in income shares, the supply-side story is indeed turned on its head. And why not? Common sense would tell you that when tax rates are cut more for those in the top brackets, tax burdens will rise for those in lower brackets.

The supply-siders argue that by reducing tax rates the government somehow can raise national income above what it otherwise would have been by stimulating the desire to work, save and invest. That way, even though rates have been cut more at the top, after-tax incomes at the bottom could still be higher than they otherwise would have been.

So far there are precious few signs of that happening. Certainly there is nothing in the 1982 IRS figures to indicate that it has.

But on the possibility that it could happen, President Reagan and Congress cut tax rates while cutting domestic spending and rapidly increasing defense spending. The resulting huge budget deficits mean that interest payments on the national debt are rising by leaps and bounds. And that means that taxes in the future will have to be higher than they otherwise would have been just to meet those interest payments.

Assume for a moment that the tax cuts eventually do pay off as the supply-siders still claim they will, and that national income is raised by some increment. Will after-tax incomes be higher than they otherwise would have been once that bigger interest bill is taken into account? Incomes could be up, but taxes could be up still more.

Of course, whatever the level of income, the relative burden of taxes will still have been shifted toward lower-income taxpayers. That is doubly true after counting the Social Security payroll tax.

Perhaps even the supply-siders' faith is being shaken these days. Why else are they so anxious to jump to conclusions about the meaning of preliminary 1982 tax figures?●

AGRICULTURAL PATENT REFORM ACT

HON. DAN GLICKMAN

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing with Congressman MIKE DEWINE the Agricultural Patent Reform Act. This bill addresses a major inequity in our current patent system for products such as pesticides, animal drugs, and certain other chemicals that must undergo Federal premarket testing and review before they can be marketed. As a general rule, the patents on these products are issued during the time the products are undergoing the Federal premarketing review, a process that may take several years. In the meantime, the clock on the patent ticks away. It is not unusual for 6 or 7 years or more of patent life to be lost while the review period is underway. As a result, rather than having an effective patent life of 17 years, these products may end up with an effective patent life of 10 to 11 years or even less. Our bill aims to correct this problem by restoring to the patent term the period that is lost because of Federal premarket review requirements, up to a maximum of 5 years.

Many of my colleagues may recall that the Judiciary Committee approved a similar bill last Congress. Our bill differs from this earlier legislation in that our bill does not cover human pharmaceutical products which were the center of major controversy. Instead, our bill covers agricultural chemicals and animal drugs, which were noncontroversial aspects of that earlier bill. Those provisions were supported by the generic manufacturers of these products and by farmers and farm organizations concerned about their livestock and crops.

A great many questions were raised last Congress about the human pharmaceutical aspects of the bill. In fact, those concerns led me to vote against that legislation in spite of my realization of the problems caused by patents being effectively shortened as a result of the regulation reviews required by Federal laws. Our colleague, Congressman HENRY WAXMAN, has been working in this Congress trying to resolve those questions. I commend him for his efforts. If that can be worked out, I would want the Judiciary Committee to consider broader patent legislation covering human pharmaceuticals as well as the agricultural chemicals and animal drugs covered by the bill I am introducing today.

Let me give you one example of why patent reform for agricultural chemicals is so important. In my own State of Kansas, farmers lost 9 percent of their wheat crop to two virus strains alone in 1981. Those crops were lost after sizable investments both financially and timewise by farmers who are hard pressed to make ends meet under even the best of conditions. Billions of dollars in damage to the world's commerical crops are caused each year by pests and disease. And of course damage to crops is only part of the story. This past winter, tens of millions of egg laying hens died from or were destroyed to prevent the spread of avian flu virus. The U.S. Department of Agriculture estimates that livestock valued at $12 billion are lost each year to animal diseases. These economic losses, as I noted before, fall heavily on farmers who can ill-afford any further costs of production. Beyond that, these crop, livestock, and poultry losses of billions of dollars annually also lead to higher food prices to the consumer.

The development of new and improved agricultural chemcials and animal drugs are critical if we are to avoid losses like those I have just described. That is the alternate goal of our legislation. It assures there will continue to be an adequate incentive for companies to go through the costly and lengthy process of bringing new pesticides to market, and I would stress again that, in these instances, the users of these products and manufacturers of generics support these changes.

Research and development underlying new pesticides is extremely costly. It is not unusual for a company to invest $40 million in research and development for a single product, not counting the capital required for new plant. And the risks of failure are great. Only one in every 20,000 chemicals synthesized results in a successful product. With odds like this it is clearly understandable for a company to expect to have an adequate patent life on products that do ultimately reach the market. An adequate patent term is the only way a company knows it will be able to recoup its significant R&D investment. This is particularly essential with the agricultural chemical industry where intense price competition precludes investment recovery until late in the life cycle of the typical agrichemical product, often at or about the time the shortened patent life of the product is about to expire.

It is important to keep in mind that the pesticide industry is highly competitive. There will always be alternative products farmers can turn to if a patent holder tries to extract premium prices on a particular product. Remember, the farmer is a businessman and will be willing to buy a product only if it makes economic sense to do so. The farmer and not some third party determines whether and at what price to purchase a pesticide or veterinary product. Prices must reflect the benefits the product provides to the farmer. Again, this differs fundamentally from the situation in the case of pharmaceuticals used to respond to human health problems.

An adequate patent life is also very important to encourage research in recombinant DNA technology for agricultural chemicals and animal drugs. This is an intriguing and promising area but the research and development is extremely costly. We shouldn't let U.S. companies lose out to foreign competitors in this new area because of inadequate incentives for domestic research and development.

We all have an interest in the development of improved pesticides and animal drugs. As I have stated, the most immediate beneficiary is the farmer. Better pesticides can save him money in several ways: By being more labor saving, by requiring application of smaller and smaller amounts to larger areas, by covering a wider weed spectra and being more potent, and by being more environmentally sound. Improved animal drugs can prevent devastating loss of valuable livestock and poultry. Of course, consumers ultimately benefit as well. In sum, improved pesticides and animal drugs mean more efficient, cost-effective agriculture.

It is not surprising then that patent reform for agricultural chemicals and animal drugs is supported by a wide ranging group of organizations. For example, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Association of Wheat Growers, the National Cotton Council of America, the National Broiler Council, the National Cattleman's Association, the United Fresh Fruit & Vegetable Association and the National Arborist Association are just a few of the many organizations that support this needed patent reform.

Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues will join us in working for the prompt enactment of this legislation. It is balanced, it is fair, it is noncontroversial and it is needed today.●

IDA NUDEL'S 53D BIRTHDAY

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is Ida Nudel's 53d birthday.

As my colleagues are aware, Ida Nudel is a long-term refusenik who has been waiting for 13 years for permission to emigrate to Israel. Her requests have been repeatedly denied.

She is a brave woman who has devoted her life to the well-being of others who want to emigrate and who are repressed by the Soviet authorities. In fact she has become known as the guardian angel of those who dissent and suffer within the Soviet Union. The KGB has mounted continuous attacks on her but she still signs her name on hundreds of letters of protest and appeals to the Soviet authorities and to the outside world.

In 1978, she hung a banner from her balcony which read, "KGB Give Me My Visa." She was subsequently arrested for "malicious hooliganism," tried in a "kangaroo court," and sentenced to 4 years internal exile in Siberia. Still, through all this, she maintained her dignity and continued to encourage her fellow Russians from her exile.

Now, since her 1982 release, Ida has been residing in the small Moldavian town of Bendery. The Soviet authorities denied her permission to return to her home in Moscow. Suffering from a chronic heart ailment, she was warned not to leave Bendery for the medical treatment she desperately needs. Even more alarming, the Soviet KGB has had her activities under constant surveillance and has instituted high pressure tactics to keep her from observing religious holidays and associating with other Jewish "refuseniks." Recently she was told that she is being watched "by the people whose job it is to do so" and that she is not to have any more visits to her home by "people who call themselves refuseniks."

Ida's sister in Israel, Elena Fridman, states, and I concur, that "After 12 years of refusals, the time has certainly come for the Soviet authorities to relent." I believe this woman has given of herself and has suffered unfairly. We should remember her today and push the Russians to let Ida emigrate to Israel.

But let us not only remember Ida and others like her today, rather, let us use her birthday as a reminder of the terrible abrogation of human rights that continually occurs in the Soviet Union. And let us use it as a reminder of our duty to help protect and support those rights. In Ida's own words:

It seems to me that an individual's opposition to social injustice acquires meaning and significance only when it is supported and encouraged by the men of good will all over the world.

Happy birthday, Ida. We pledge to you that we will do all that we can to bring justice to your plight.●

IN SUPPORT OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR THE SUMMER YOUTH EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

HON. HAROLD E. FORD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support House efforts in obtaining a supplemental appropriation for the summer youth employment program. More than $100 million has been cut nationwide from the program by the administration. The programs are scheduled to begin on May 1, 1984, therefore Congress must take immediate action to restore the necessary funds to rectify this tremendous reduction and bring the summer youth employment programs back to last year's funding.

Because of a change in the formula for appropriating how funds are distributed, and a $100 million reduction in funds from fiscal year 1983, the city of Memphis and Shelby County which is located in my congressional district will lose more than $600,000. This decrease, means a 19-percent reduction for the city of Memphis and a loss of over 600 summer jobs.

There is a need for these jobs in Memphis and Shelby County. The Private Industry Council has received requests for almost 5,000 jobs, but will only be able to place 2,600 teenagers in those positions, because of the Federal cutbacks in the summer youth employment program.

We all know that unemployment is more than 50 percent among black teenagers and without these additional funds, those unemployment figures will rise even higher. How do you tell the thousands of young people in this country who depend on this program to help support their families—who use this money to pay for their schooling—that there will not be a job available for them.

We cannot afford to let these young people who want to work, stand on the street corners and waste their time this summer. We in the Congress cannot turn our backs. It is a small price to pay to provide a start for needy young people, and the cost to us, in terms of lack of job experience for those teenagers, could well impair their ability to find work as adults. We must give them the opportunity to work today, so that our society can benefit tomorrow.

I urge my colleagues to support and help pass a supplemental appropriation to restore the $100 million in funds so that young people in Memphis and throughout the country can have jobs this summer.●

GOOD ADVICE TO CONGRESS FROM MORE THAN 13,000 VERMONTERS

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, over the last decade I have made an annual tradition of sharing with my colleagues the results of my Vermont questionnaire. It is a pleasure to be able to continue that tradition today.

More than 13,000 responses to the 1984 questionnaire have now been tabulated. As in past years, I am sincerely impressed by the high level of participation and by the depth of Vermonters' insights into the issues we face in Congress. I believe their advice is well worth the attention of all Members of this Chamber.

ACID RAIN

Four general positions on the acid rain issue were listed, and Vermonters were asked which came closest to their views. The options, and the percentage of Vermonters who agreed with each, are as follows:

A. Since acid rain is the result of pollution from other States, the cleanup costs should be shouldered entirely by people who live in those States. (18 percent of Vermonters agreed.)

B. Since Vermont is on the receiving end of the acid rain problem, it is fair that we should help pay the cleanup costs. Our share of the expense should be less than that of the polluting States. (21 percent agreed.)

C. Regardless of whether nationwide cost sharing is fair, we should accept it if that is the only way to get legislation passed to clean up acid rain. (56 percent agreed.)

D. There is no need for legislation to clean up acid rain. The benefits would not justify the cost. (Only 4 percent agreed.)

Significantly, 77 percent of Vermonters checked either "B" or "C", indicating willingness to pay a portion of the cleanup cost, even though our State is on the receiving end of the problem, rather than the contributing end.

That fact, combined with the growing and decisive evidence that acid rain is a major problem nationwide, should eliminate any conceivable argument for further delay in significant action by Congress.

ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

Five economic problem areas were listed, and Vermonters were asked to check the one they consider most serious. The problems, and the percentage of Vermonters who checked each, were as follows:

A. Inflation. (6 percent.)

B. High Interest rates. (6 percent.)

C. Unemployment. (15 percent.)

D. The Federal deficit. (49 percent.)

E. Worldwide economic deterioration, including mounting Third World debt, trade imbalances, and protectionism. (24 percent.)

A number of respondents chided me for making the question overly simplistic. They noted, correctly, that economic problems interact with each other and cannot be treated in a vacuum, and that the options listed were about as comparable as apples and oranges.

Nevertheless, it is important to know which problem areas are of the greatest concern. It may be an indication of the economic sophistication of the Vermont public that the largest numbers showed greatest concern over the causes of our economic problems, rather than the painful effects.

It is particularly noteworthy, although not surprising, that the problem of greatest concern is the one over which we have the most control—the Federal deficit.

REDUCING THE DEFICIT

To learn what steps Vermonters feel should be taken to reduce the deficit, five options were listed, and respondents were allowed to check more than one. This question was identical to one asked in last year's questionnaire, as I wanted to learn whether there have been any significant shifts in opinion. Following is the list of options and the percentage of Vermonters who checked each, both this year and in 1983.

A. Raise taxes. (35 percent in 1984; 28 percent in 1983.)

B. Reduce defense spending. (75 percent in 1984; 68 percent in 1983.)

C. Reduce benefits for individuals. (27 percent in 1984; 31 percent in 1983.)

D. Reduce payments to States and localities. (25 percent in 1984; 22 percent in 1983.)

E. None of the above is necessary. The problem will be resolved by the economic recovery which is now under way. (7 percent in 1984; 8 percent in 1983.)

The shift in opinion over the last year is subtle, but a comparison of the results of the 1983 and 1984 questionnaires seems to indicate intensification of concern over the Federal deficit. With only one exception, all the means of reducing the deficit have at least slightly increased support among Vermonters this year. The one exception is cuts in benefits for individuals. This may indicate a growing view that cuts in this general area are already as deep as they should be.

MILITARY POLICY

The questionnaire did not address U.S. policy in specific trouble spots, but rather concentrated on Vermonters' views toward the general trends of the last year. Three statements were listed, and each respondent checked the one closest to his or her views. The statements and percentages result follow:

A. The U.S. must flex its military muscle in order to reaffirm its leadership in the world. The administration's actions deserve the support of all Americans—20 percent agreed.

B. Our country must exert all the influence it can on world events, but is placing too much emphasis on military might. More emphasis should be given to other means of influence, such as peace initiatives, diplomacy and economic assistance—54 percent agreed.

C. The U.S. should be less involved in the affairs of other nations, and place more emphasis on our troubles at home—26 percent agreed.

Any analysis of these figures makes it clear that most Vermonters believe it is important for the U.S. to assume a strong leadership role in our troubled world, but that we have been too quick to show military strength at the expense of other forms of influence.

The combined response to "A" and "B" indicates 74 percent believe in strong U.S. world leadership. The combined response to "B" and "C" indicates 80 percent would like less military involvement.

EDUCATION

A year ago this week, the National Commission on Excellence in Education jolted us all by reporting a "rising tide of mediocrity" in our schools. Most of us agree that the Federal Government cannot resolve the problems of education by itself, but we have had many vigorous debates as to what the Federal role should be.

Because of my role on the Education and Labor Committee, the views of Vermonters on this vitally important issue are of particular interest to me. The questionnaire listed four options, and respondents were asked to check the one which is closest to their views. The options and percentage responses are as follows:

A. The Federal Government should provide more direct aid to public schools, for example to upgrade teachers' salaries and improve programs in areas such as math, science, and foreign languages. (45 percent agreed.)

B. The Federal Government should provide indirect aid by providing tax credits or other help to parents who send their children to private schools. (6 percent agreed.)

C. The Federal Government should take both of the above steps. (12 percent agreed.)

D. The Federal Government should reduce its involvement in education. Local and State governments can do a better job without Federal help or interference. (37 percent agreed.)

In interpreting the results, it is important to note that a total of 57 percent ("A" and "C" combined) supports more direct aid to public schools. A total of 18 percent of Vermonters ("B" and "C" combined) supports tax credits or other indirect aid to private schools.

These figures leave no doubt that Vermonters are deeply concerned over the quality of our public schools, and a majority believes more help from the Federal Government is needed. But the 37 percent who take the opposing view are a significant minority. It is clear there is still a significant level of distrust of the strings which might be attached to Federal aid to education.

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

Vermonters were asked what action, if any, Congress should take this year with regard to the ERA. Three options were listed:

A. Approve the ERA in its original form, to give the States another chance to consider ratification of it. (35 percent agreed.)

B. Approve the ERA with one modification: a provision to assure it will still be possible to distinguish between the obligations of men and women in laws relating to the military draft and assignment to combat duty. (29 percent agreed.)

C. Reject the ERA, because present constitutional law adequately protects the rights of women. (36 percent agreed.)

Since Vermont has been on record in favor of ERA for longer than most other States, I frankly expected an even higher level of support for its revival. Perhaps there is frustration over the setbacks that have occurred over a great many years of effort, or a feeling that it would be more productive for now to focus on other specific legislative initiatives to further the cause of equal rights.

Even so, a big majority of Vermonters—64 percent—expressed support for revival of ERA in one form or another. Despite a division of opinion on its application to military service obligations, it is clear that most Vermonters believe it is well worth our while to continue the effort to enact an equal rights amendment.

VERMONT WILDERNESS

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that several months ago this Chamber approved legislation to put to rest the long dispute over additional wilderness designations for Vermont's Green Mountain National Forest.

That legislation was, and is, a carefully crafted compromise, intended to meet the legitimate needs and concerns of all factions of Vermonters on this sensitive issue. Because of the importance of this legislation to a great many Vermonters, I felt it was important to test public opinion on the issue one more time, prior to its final enactment into law.

Three options were listed, and Vermonters were asked to check the one closest to their views. The options were a little complex, but generally represent the range of opinions which had been expressed during the extensive consideration of this measure.

A. The original bill introduced by Vermont's congressional delegation, designating 65,000 acres of the federally owned forest as wilderness, should be adopted. This bill was a compromise, as proponents had sought 100,000 acres. Leaving 86 percent of Vermont's public forestland (78 percent of the Green Mountain Forest) for nonwilderness use was more than reasonable. (44 percent of Vermonters agreed with this position.)

B. The compromise bill negotiated by Vermont's delegation and already approved by the House, should be passed into law. This bill, which designates about 40,000 acres of the national forest as wilderness and about 22,000 acres as a national recreation area, meets the most important concerns of all factions. (42 percent agreed.)

C. No further permanent wilderness should be designated in Vermont for the indefinite future. All lands not presently in permanent wilderness ought to be returned promptly to continuing professional multiple-use management by the U.S. Forest Service. The compromise bill proposed by the Vermont congressional delegation should be killed—14 percent agreed.

Despite a division of opinion on the extent of the compromise, the results clearly underscore the belief of a large majority of Vermonters that after all these years of consideration, we should enact legislation to designate additional wilderness areas without further delay.

Since the affected land is entirely within the State of Vermont, I trust that all involved in this decision will continue to respect the views of the people of Vermont.

USE OF THE QUESTIONNAIRE

In my 10 years as a Member of this Chamber, the annual questionnaire has become an extremely valuable tool, which is referred to throughout each year in my office as a routine part of our analysis of new legislative proposals.

It is important to recognize the limitations of public opinion surveys. The categories of opinion are inherently arbitrary, and the results lack the important personal insights which are contained in the thousands of letters and personal comments I receive from Vermonters. Therefore, the questionnaire is a valuable complement to those forms of expression, but never could be a substitute.

Obviously, the votes all of us cast in this Chamber are ultimately decisions of conscience. What is right is not always what is popular. But none of us can hope to be an opinion leader without constant effort to tap into the collective wisdom of the people we represent.

The questionnaire is an important part of that effort in my office. Over the years I have become deeply impressed by the active involvement of Vermonters, and by the depth of their insights into the complex issues we face in Congress.

The more than 13,000 Vermonters who participated in this year's questionnaire have my sincere gratitude. They have provided an excellent policy guide for a great many of the most significant issues that face us now and in the foreseeable future.●

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sorrow that we learned this week of the death of the master photographer, Ansel Adams, whose works are familiar to millions of Americans. For over 50 years, Mr. Adams meticulously recorded our Nation's wilderness, making him the most widely exhibited, published, and best-known photographer of our time. His majestic photographs of America's landscape capture the awesomeness of nature with their brilliant clarity and precision.

Mr. Adams, who was awarded the Medal of Freedom in 1980, deserves special recognition for his important contributions to photographic technology and its recognition as a major art form. A cofounder of the Department of Photography at the Museum of Modern Art, he also distinguished himself as a teacher, critic, and author.

Ansel Adams was no stranger to Washington's politics. Through his love of nature, he fought to protect the wilderness which he so carefully recorded on film. Actively involved in environmental preservation, he was a director of the Sierra Club from 1934 to 1971. His effectiveness as a lobbyist was directly responsible for the creation of Kings Canyon National Park in California.

Ansel Adams' vision of nature through the photographic eye has become an indelible image of our country. He will be remembered with respect and admiration for his devotion to his art and his evocation of the precision and grandeur of the American landscape.●

ANOTHER COMMENDATION FOR THE LONG BEACH NAVAL SHIPYARD ON A JOB WELL DONE

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am tired of constantly hearing adverse stories, frequently unsubstantiated, about the Federal bureaucracy and of how unmotivated Government workers supposedly are. Some of our colleagues tend to be long on criticism and all too short on praise for Federal employees.

Well, today, I would like to share with my colleagues a story complimentary of Federal workers who have received due recognition for a job well done. I am referring to the dedicated workers of the Long Beach Naval Shipyard in Long Beach, Calif. Once again, the excellence of their work has prompted an official commendation. In a recent message to the shipyard, Vice Adm. E. B. Fowler, Naval Sea Systems Commander, expressed his appreciation and extended his congratulations to the shipyard for completing the overhaul of the U.S.S. Ogden ahead of schedule. In his message, Vice Admiral Fowler stated:

A positive aggressive attitude continually maintained at Long Beach Naval Shipyard and by the U.S.S. Ogden crew throughout her overhaul combined to deliver the ship early. To produce such positive results would not have been possible without the mutual determination, cooperation, and team effort exhibited by both Shipyard and ship's force personnel. Particularly significant in this achievement was the Shipyard's ability to convert a work package written by and for a private shipyard availability . . . without benefit of a ship check. The Shipyard also had to overcome significant obstacles encountered because of late delivery of . . . material and equipment and significant shortfalls . . . I extend my congratulations to the Long Beach Naval Shipyard team for having distinguished themselves with such outstanding professional performance in support of the Fleet . . . well done!

Mr. Speaker, today I want to join with Vice Admiral Fowler in extending my commendations and congratulations to Capt. George Fink, Shipyard Commander, and to all the dedicated employees of the Long Beach Naval Shipyard on another job well done. This is the same team that delivered the U.S.S. New Jersey in 1982 ahead of schedule and within budget. The fact that the New Jersey has been able to stay deployed so long, most recently off the coast of Lebanon, without a service call is a fine tribute to the quality of work the shipyard delivers. Their performance once again confirms their great devotion to upholding their motto: "Can Do!"●

MORE ARMS IN GRENADA

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to share this interesting newspaper article about Cuban weapons caches on Grenada with my colleagues in the House. As more and more information comes to our attention about the Soviet and Cuban plans for that island, the more I realize that what our Government did in October was just and proper.

With large numbers of Soviet, Cuban, Bulgarian, North Korean, Libyan, and East German advisers, the small island of Grenada was being turned into a new Cuba in the Caribbean. Millions of rounds of ammunition, weapons, and related items of military equipment, to include antiaircraft weapons and armored personnel carriers, were initially found on the island after our troops mounted their successful rescue operation. Although our forces thought that they had found just about all of the vast quantities of military equipment, the following news release shows that the Cubans had hidden more ammunition and weapons in their Embassy on the island. Perhaps they left the weapons supply in their Embassy in anticipation of the day when they would return and again force their will on the freedom-loving Grenadian people.

One of the great ironies about the Cuban takeover of Grenada is that the Cuban Ambassador there became the most powerful man on the island and essentially "ran the show." Although the former Prime Minister, Maurice Bishop, complained bitterly about his loss of authority and control, little could be done since the Cubans and their friends held all the cards and all the weapons. Once again, force is the name of the game these days.

After Bishop returned from the United States and tried to steer his government along a more moderate course, the more radical Marxist-Leninists decided that he was not serving the interests of the revolution. A few days later, Bishop and a number of his followers were brutally gunned down near a fort in the city.

One of the basic concepts which drives Marxism-Leninism is the belief that force can and must be used to attain the goals of the revolution. Is there any wonder then that the little island of Grenada was overflowing with a wide range of Soviet and Eastern bloc military equipment, and personnel?

The recent arms cache at the abandoned Cuban Embassy is a stark reminder that the Soviets, Cubans, and their Eastern European friends, to include Cuba and Nicaragua, mean business.

With these observations in mind, I recommend this article to my colleagues in the Congress.

ARMS FOUND UNDER CUBAN EMBASSY FLOOR IN GRENADA

ST. GEORGE'S, GRENADA.—A large cache of arms including automatic rifles and 1 million rounds of ammunition has been found hidden under a floor in the Cuban Embassy, Grenada's interim government said Tuesday.

The government information service said troops of the Caribbean Peace-keeping Forces, acting on a tip from a Grenadian guard placed in the Cuban Embassy compound in Morne Jaloux near St. George's, found the weapons and ammunition March 26 in a closet with a false floor.

The weapons included 49 American-made M-16 and 40 Russian AK-47 automatic rifles, numerous hand guns and three rocket-propelled grenade launchers, along with the ammunition, the government said.

A government statement made no mention as to whether the weapons were in working condition, but said they would be placed on display Thursday at Fort Rupert, scene of the Oct. 19 massacre in which Prime Minister Maurice Bishop and at least two dozen others were killed.

The search of the Cuban Embassy took place after the sole remaining Cuban diplomat in Grenada, charge d'affaires Gaston Diaz, left the island March 19.

The announcement came a day before the start of a preliminary inquiry into murder and conspiracy charges against 20 people in connection with the October 1983 coup that toppled Bishop's Cuban-backed government.

The hearing will consider murder and conspiracy charges against the 20 suspects. If Magistrate Lyle St. Paul finds probable cause on the charges, they will face trial at a later date.

Among those charged with murder are former Deputy Prime Minister Bernard Coard, his wife, Phyllis, and Gen. Hudson Austin, chairman of the Revolutionary Military Council that ruled Grenada for six days until the Oct. 25 invasion by U.S. and Caribbean troops.

Invading forces initially encountered stiff resistance from some 600 well-armed Cuban reservists working on the Point Salines airfield, financed by Cuban and Soviet bloc nations.

But with American backing, Gov. General Sir Paul Scoon expelled Cuban, Soviet and Libyan diplomats, and eventually, all the Cuban reservists.

A search of the Soviet diplomats' luggage at the airfield before they left the island uncovered a large number of weapons, mostly AK-47's, which U.S. servicemen confiscated.

In the weeks following the invasion, U.S. troops found dozens of weapons caches in searches of the island, and offered rewards to Grenadians who turned in weapons they had harbored or found abandoned.

The Caribbean Peace-keeping Force, made up of soldiers from several Caribbean nations, took over protection of Grenada after American troops left the island.●

CLARENCE AYERS: THE HIGHEST AND THE BEST

HON. BUDDY MacKAY

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Speaker, throughout my years of public service, I have met countless individuals, among them the most intelligent, the most powerful, the wealthy, and the expert. Yet, I came to realize that the most important attribute an individual can possess is the willingness to make a contribution to his community. Had I gone in search of a man imbued with the highest sense of contribution, I would not have had to search past my own congressional district because Clarence Ayers, of Gainesville, is this sense of contribution personified.

It is said that a man is rarely honored in his own hometown, yet the Gainesville Sun and the residents of Gainesville have honored Mr. Ayers with the Gainesville Sun's "Twenty-first Annual Community Service Award." I know of no one, nationwide, who deserves such an honor more than Clarence and I include the article from the Gainesville Sun so that others may know him to be, as I know him, the highest and the best:

In 1954, Clarence Ayers listened to entreaties from his wife and children that they should move south and escape the bad weather that rocketed down from Canada to buffet their home in Aberdeen, S.D.

So Ayers moved to Gainesville, a town he never had seen but which had the small size, growth potential and mostly the climate that would be right for his wife and six children.

He quickly became enthralled with Gainesville, then a placid, almost bucolic place with trees right in the middle of University Avenue and cows grazing on much of the acreage now occupied by shopping malls and planned unit developments.

"It didn't take any great mastermind to see that there would be a lot of growth," said Ayers. "The Sun Belt was picked to make great strides in growth, the University of Florida was popping at the seams, veterans were getting out of school, so it didn't take a crystal ball to see that Gainesville would grow."

Ayers had much to do with the expansion of Gainesville. As a banker, especially a president of the powerful Atlantic First National Bank, he loaned the money which helped build new homes and businesses ranging from an envelope plant to auto distributorships.

But what earned Clarence Ayers the Gainesville Sun's 21st Annual Community Service Award is his off-the-job, private efforts to expand and improve health care, education and the general quality of life for which Gainesville has become known.

A number of Gainesville-area residents wrote letters of endorsement for Ayers, who was selected from among 14 candidates by a panel of judges not connected with the Sun.

Letters recommending Ayers show a remarkable consistency in their descriptions of an unassuming, kindly and self-effacing man who nevertheless became one of Gainesville's effective movers and shakers.

"Kindly and gracious at all times," was one description of Ayers.

"Fine gentleman," said another. "The highest and the best."

"A quiet, courteous and thoughtful person," agreed a third.

Ayers, evidently, has not changed. In a story published in the Sun in 1976, Bob Hester, then-president of the First Federal Savings and Loan Association of Mid-Florida, said, "He just isn't the gladhand, slap-you-on-the-back sort of person that a lot of executives that attain his position are. But don't let that reservation fool you.

The reservation of Ayers when serving the community is a matter of speaking softly while carrying the big stick. An accomplishment most remembered is the way in which Ayers as chairman of the board of Alachua General Hospital directed the hospital out of its financial woes, planned for expansion, and turned AGH into a competitive health institution.

"We had real problems," said Ayers in typical understatement. "We lost $1 million in one year and for three years it was a real struggle. We enlarged the hospital, doubled its size. We had to, to survive. Patients were in the aisles down there."

Ayers has, to varying extents, given time to the Gainesville Area Chamber of Commerce, Santa Fe Health Care Systems, the Committee of 100, youth sports activities and his church.

"What happens, if you're willing to get involved, you get into organizations and work with them. Then others want your time, too," said Ayers. "You finally reach a point where there's no more time to give. Then you have to be selective in what you do."

For 17 years—since 1967—Ayers has found time in his schedule to serve on the Sante Fe Community College Board of Trustees. Presiding over the college's governing board three terms as chairman, Ayers displays those proprietary insights of a banker by questioning contracts and carefully viewing expenses which don't seem to make sense.

Yet there is more to Ayers' interest in education than scrutinizing the ledgers. Basic compassion seems a motivation; testimonials about his humanity are abundant, but the best evidence is his view that the community college "open door" policy of admitting most state high school graduates provides education and a better life for people who otherwise might have had to settle for a lesser existence.

"You can argue about the open door, but it permitted an awful lot of people to get a better education and employ themselves where they never would have had the opportunity," said Ayers. "When I go out at graduation time and see the families of the students—they can be young or old, it makes no difference—it really strikes a strain in the heart to see someone in the family do something in education.

"It's probably the first time someone in the family did something in the education field, probably the first one in the family to go beyond high school. They seem to go on and compete with upper division (university) graduates. They fight, scrap and get their share of education and come out of it, I think, as much better students."

Ayers' higher education experience was at the University of Kentucky, where he was a light but elusive tailback in the early days of the Southeastern Conference. Ayers was 150 pounds when running out of the UK backfield, a weight he still maintains.

In 1936 Ayers graduated from UK and married his hometown sweetheart, Isabelle. The nation was in the midst of the Great Depression and Ayers accepted a lone job offer with the Goodyear Tire Co. Times, though, became even harder when America entered World War II in 1941.

North Africa and, eventually, France were the wartime destinations for Lt. Ayers, a supply officer who to this day is quietly amazed that the first load shipped into Marseille was not combat materiel for American troops but rather sacks of flour for French refugees.

"The service was an enlightening experience," said the laconic Ayers, "but it certainly is something you don't want to do every day. Once is enough, and I was fortunate in my assignments because I had a lot of friends and learned that this person was killed or that person was incapacitated. Anyone who came through it whole ought to be thankful."

After the war Ayers found work with a consumer loan company, and he began his banking career in Aberdeen, S.D. Ayers enjoyed the friends he met in Aberdeen, but the city's "pretty severe" weather induced him to move south to, as it happens, Gainesville.

Ayers never anticipated becoming a bank president, but in 1967 he became the chief executive for the Atlantic First National Bank. The power over vast amounts of money settled well on Ayers, a private executive who felt that a bank has an almost public duty to its community.

"I never did believe that money does any good in a vault or in investment bonds except as necessary," said Ayers. "You use money when you can use it to advantage and pay back what you borrowed. Where it can, a bank's obligation is to the community.

"The money's built a lot of businesses around town and it's built a lot of homes. It's helped people in business to grow. Some fell by the wayside but the majority fulfilled their promises because their plans worked out."

The 71-year old Ayers retired from banking a few years ago and, in accustomed fashion, used the earned rest as a "semi-retirement" where various causes always seem to demand attention.

Recreation consists mostly of golfing, a sport in which Ayers is a self-described "once-a-month-hacker," and attending basketball games at the University of Florida or at area high schools. However, a serious illness has curtailed the outside activities once favored by Ayers.

"Until I got sick I was in kind of an active semi-retirement," said Ayers. "I'd work a few times a week and the rest of my time would be spent with Santa Fe Health Care Systems or something somebody else wanted me to do."

Ayers also is a casual fisherman, the kind who enjoys the scenery whether or not fish are caught. He fondly recalls breakfasts that tasted good at 4 a.m., lolling around in a small boat, and pulling up on a bank for a box lunch.

Although he doesn't get outside much nowadays, Ayers carries in his mind the images of dawn on a North Florida lake, of the mist, quiet, and perhaps most of all, respite from a life that hasn't given him much time to be alone.

"It was real nice to be out on a lake early," said Ayers. "You can watch the fish jumping, the birds coming in. And it was quiet."●

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE STS-41C CREW AND JAMES VAN HOFTEN

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to be the Representative from Riverside, Calif., home of Astronaut James Van Hoften, one of the astronauts who repaired the solar maximum satellite. I commend the crew and the control team at Goddard Space Flight Center for their success in repair of this satellite. Future cost savings and scientific benefits are far reaching. Rather than being restricted to costly and time-consuming replacement of a malfunctioning satellite, we have now demonstrated an alternative; we can retrieve and repair satellites. Plans are already being developed to attempt a similar rescue and repair mission on two recently lost communications satellites. If successful, this effort would produce savings of hundreds of millions of dollars to owners of these satellites.

Again, my congratulations to the crew, and to NASA. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

GRACE COMMISSION

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I have become quite interested in the Grace Commission, its reports and the Congressional Budget Office and General Accounting Office review of the reports.

First, a bit of history. The Federal Advisory Committee Act of 1972 sets up certain requirements for advisory committees. Those requirements include, in pertinent part, an annual report by the President to Congress including—

> The activities, status, and changes in the composition of advisory committees in existence during the preceding calendar year. The report shall contain the name of every advisory committee, the date of and authority for its creation, its termination date or the date it is to make a report, its functions, a reference to the reports it has submitted, a statement of whether it is an ad hoc or continuing body, the dates of its meetings, the names and occupations of its current members, and the total estimated annual cost to the United States to fund, service, supply, and maintain such committee. (5 U.S.C. Ap. 1, Sec. 6c).

The Grace Commission was organized in such a manner as to avoid these requirements. Given that individuals from industries regulated by specific agencies reviewed those same agencies, it is not difficult to understand why it would be awkward to report the names and occupations of the reviewers.

Moving on toward some of the general assumptions of the Commission, it is important that we apply an analytic eye. For example, the Commission assumed a 10-percent inflation rate and a 10-percent interest rate over 3 years. Given that the inflation rate is a component of the interest rate with risk and profit raising the interest rate over the inflation rate, one can readily see that the Commission used parallel rates which are an economic impossibility. This is particularly curious in light of the fact that since 1981 the United States has experienced the highest real interest rates—the difference between inflation and the interest rate—since the Great Depression. Uncertainty about inflation coupled with the ever present incentive for profit, or getting whatever the market will bear, has kept long-term real interest rates at unprecedented highs. To assume, therefore that interest and inflation rates will be close—much less the same—is absurd.

The gross amount of savings over 3 years projected by the Grace Commission was $424 billion but Mr. J. Peter Grace testified before the Senate Finance Committee on February 8, 1984, that the 3-year savings were not for any particular 3 years and definitely not for the next 3 years. The CBO-GAO study concluded that potential savings over 3 years could be $98 billion. The Commission takes its estimate from the nearly 2,500 recommendations that it made. Of those recommendations, CBO-GAO believed that 242 recommendations had merit and of these, 150 had previously been made by the GAO.

This brief overview of the Grace Commission provides some insight into the efficiency of private enterprise when applied to government. Recommending what has been recommended in the past or what is in the process of implementation does not strike me as very creative. Grace Commission proposals which require major policy or statutory changes are indicative of a lack of understanding of the functions of government. Unlike private industry, government cannot abandon markets that are unprofitable. Governmental services necessarily flow to those people and those areas of endeavor which are most costly and least likely to be sought out by private industry. This is the reality of government service.●

THE FLYING DUTCHMEN AEROMODELERS ORGANIZATION

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. Congress an important milestone in the history of the Flying Dutchmen Aeromodelers Organization of Reading, Pa. This year marks the 50th anniversary of this outstanding organization, which has grown into one of the most respected clubs in model aviation in the country.

The Flying Dutchmen Aeromodelers Organization is a charter member of the Academy of Model Aeronautics and a member of the Federation Aeronautique Internationals and the National Aeronautic Association. When they began in 1934, the Flying Dutchmen Aeromodelers Organization flew from baseball diamonds, playgrounds, and abandoned fields. As their membership grew, they established a permanent flying field. In 1948, the club rebuilt Drenkel Field and it was used successfully until 1967.

At that time the field came into disrepair and the club with the assistance of the city government established a renovated Drenkel Field, home of the Flying Dutchmen Organization, which has become the finest control line flying site in the United States. Open to the public, the field has four fully paved flying circles, picnic tables and grills, bleacher and park bench seating, and a fully paved parking lot. Primarily a control line club, the Flying Dutchmen also fly all facets of the hobby: Control line, radio control, free flight, and rubber power.

The Flying Dutchmen Aeromodelers Organization is dedicated to promoting model aviation as a family hobby and sport. They have worked with many local and national civic groups including the Easter Seals Foundation, AMBUCS, Boy and Girl Scouts, Reading Rehabilitation Hospital, the Optimist Club, Schuylkill River Greenway Association, numerous church groups, and television. Each year the club travels across the country performing for the general public. They do an average of 40 shows per year.

I know that my colleagues will join me in congratulating the Flying Dutchmen Aeromodelers Organization on their 50th anniversary and in wishing them many more years of continued success.●

WHERE IS THE BEEF IN JAPAN?

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an editorial which appeared in the April 12, 1984, edition of the Washington Post concerning the senseless obstinancy by the Japanese Government on the subject of meat import quotas and the implications it has for the Japanese consumer.

The recent trade agreement with the Japanese raises the quota of imported American beef of 30,800 metric tons by 6,900 metric tons per year for 4 years. Although this 90 percent increase in beef imports may be considered generous by the Japanese Government, it means only 2 additional ounces of beef per Japanese citizen per year.

The Japanese consumer has for years desired to purchase greater quantities of beef to supplement their diets. Unfortunately, Japan's meager beef industry and the quota on imported beef have priced beef out of the reach of most Japanese consumers. The reluctance of the Japanese Government to further relax its import quota on American beef illustrates the power, influence, and fear wielded by the small Japanese agricultural population. In bowing to the selfish interests of this tiny minority, the Japanese Government continues to deny the vast majority of its population of nutritious high-quality, low-cost beef. As the world's largest producer of beef, the United States is in the best position to fill the demand of Japanese consumers for more quality beef.

For Nebraska, one of our Nation's largest beef-producing States, the recent trade agreement is an important step toward expanding the Japanese market. While the quota is still too low, and there is still a quota to limit imported meat, it is a necessary and positive first step by the Japanese to open their market to imported beef. Unfortunately, as the Washington Post notes, the real losers in this ongoing trade dispute are not just the American cattlemen but the Japanese consumers.

TRADING BEEF

The Japanese were wise to settle the rancorous quarrel over their beef import quotas last weekend. They would have been wiser to settle it a good deal sooner.

In economic terms, the whole question is trivial. But the Japanese negotiators stuck fast, month after month, protesting that they couldn't move because beef producers are very influential in Japanese politics. No doubt they are influential. So what? Imports of Japanese cars and Japanese steel into this country have generated political trouble for a succession of American presidents on a scale far beyond any challenge that beef growers can raise to a Japanese prime minister.

Perhaps it bears repeating that there is only one good reason for allowing Japanese cars and steel into this country. It's not to accommodate Japanese producers, but to benefit American customers. Those benefits are substantial. Similarly, the best reason for the Japanese government to let in more beef is not to please American cattlemen but to improve the diet of its own people.

But rising imports change a country's economic life, and it's a kind of change that always draws a political reaction. It's a government's job to deal with these side effects, not to let them paralyze it.

By resisting desperately on minor matters such as beef imports, and pushing them to the brink of crisis before compromising, Japanese negotiators create an impression of obduracy. It does not serve Japanese interests to encourage Americans to think of trade with Japan as a one-way street in which even the most modest concessions are made grudgingly and only after inordinate delay.

That impression is damaging to Japan, whose prosperity depends heavily on access to the American market. It is also unfair to Japan because, on subjects of far greater importance than beef quotas, they have taken much more enlightened positions. The Japanese government is now proceeding toward allowing foreign competition in its telecommunications industry. The possibilities there for American companies are enormous.

In the beef case, the Japanese allowed the dispute to drag on much too long at too great a political cost. The current progress in the telecommunications case is a more hopeful precedent for the governance of this enormous flow of trade that brings great advantages to both countries.●

NUCLEAR TRADE WITH CHINA

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, for the past week we have been hearing reports that President Reagan is expected to announce an agreement for nuclear cooperation with the People's Republic of China during his visit there. Such an agreement would be important not only for relations between our two nations and our common interests in expanding Sino-American trade, but it also would signal that the world's most populous nation has committed itself to the goals of nuclear nonproliferation.

However, as valuable as such an agreement would be, it is important that we do not become complacent with regard to the legal requirements of our nuclear nonproliferation laws. These laws were developed to stop the spread of nuclear weapons to other nations, and, while China is a weapons state, it is crucial that they give explicit assurances that any U.S. nuclear technology will be used only for peaceful purposes and that they abide by nonproliferation restrictions on the transfer of sensitive nuclear technology.

The terms and conditions for a cooperative agreement are spelled out in the provisions of section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act. According to statements made by administration officials these terms have been agreed to by the Chinese. If this is true, the administration should be applauded for its great achievement. However, the administration's record to date on maintaining a strong and aggressive nonproliferation policy has been miserable. Therefore, it is essential that Congress pay close attention to the language and intent of the agreement to assure the law has been followed before we fully embrace the administration's actions.

Last December I wrote Secretary of State Shultz urging that he pursue certain key provisions in reaching an agreement with the Chinese. Senators PROXMIRE, ROTH, and HUMPHREY sent a separate, but similar letter urging the same. Hopefully, he took our recommendations into account when negotiating the agreement.

We must not lose sight of the requirements in our laws and the obligations and conditions we have placed on other valued trade partners in prior agreements. To fail in this consistency will only undermine our ability to maintain the terms of these agreements and may ultimately have serious consequences for our nonproliferation efforts in general.

Mr. Speaker, I request that my letter to Secretary Shultz and a copy of the provisions required for an agreement for nuclear cooperation under section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act be inserted at the end of my statement.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY CONSERVATION AND POWER OF THE COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND COMMERCE, Washington, D.C., December 2, 1983.

Hon. GEORGE P. SHULTZ,
Secretary, Department of State,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It is my understanding that negotiations are currently under way with the People's Republic of China (PRC) on an Agreement for Cooperation with the United States governing trade of nuclear power technology. I am in strong support of efforts to establish a formal relationship with the Chinese in this important area of trade provided that the agreement be drafted as prudently as possible before it is signed and reviewed by the Congress.

In pursuit of a prudent agreement I would expect that the President would not waive any provision of any criteria set forth in Section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act.

In addition, I would expect that the body of the Agreements' text include the following provisions:

(1) An explicit pledge by the PRC not to transfer any nuclear weapons hardware or information to any nation;

(2) An explicit agreement that the PRC will require, as a condition for its own nuclear cooperation and exports, that recipient States place all of their peaceful nuclear activities under International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards.

(3) An explicit pledge that the PRC will enter into an agreement with the IAEA to voluntarily place its peaceful nuclear activities under IAEA safeguards according to terms identical with those of the US-IAEA safeguards agreement.

I believe that all of these provisions must be included in the main text of any nuclear cooperative agreement with the PRC if it is to be acceptable to the Congress.

We have a great opportunity in negotiating this agreement to further the goals of nuclear non-proliferation by enlisting the support of the People's Republic of China for those goals. Many developing nations look to the People's Republic as a model for economic growth and their development decisions are held in high regard. By joining together the American and Chinese people will be sending a strong signal to other nations that nuclear non-proliferation cooperation is fundamental to peaceful economic development.

I would hope that this letter would be shared with the PRC negotiators.

Sincerely,

RICHARD L. OTTINGER,
Chairman.

SEC. 123. COOPERATION WITH OTHER NATIONS

No cooperation with any nation, group of nations or regional defense organization pursuant to section 53, 54, a., 57, 64, 82, 91, 103, 104, or 144 shall be undertaken until—

a. The proposed agreement for cooperation has been submitted to the President, which proposed arrangement shall include the terms, conditions, duration, nature, and scope of the cooperation; and shall include the following requirements:

(1) A guaranty by the cooperating party that safeguards as set forth in the agreement for cooperation will be maintained with respect to all nuclear materials and equipment transferred pursuant thereto, and with respect to all special nuclear material used in or produced through the use of such nuclear materials and equipment, so long as the material or equipment remains under the jurisdiction or control of the cooperating party, irrespective of the duration of other provisions in the agreement or whether the agreement is terminated or suspended for any reason;

(2) In the case of non-nuclear-weapon states, a requirement, as a condition of continued United States nuclear supply under the agreement for cooperation, that IAEA safeguards be maintained with respect to all nuclear materials in all peaceful nuclear activities within the territory of such state, under its jurisdiction, or carried out under its control anywhere;

(3) Except in the case of those agreements for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., a guaranty by the cooperating party that no nuclear materials and equipment or sensitive nuclear technology to be transferred pursuant to such agreement, and no special nuclear material produced through the use of any nuclear materials and equipment or sensitive nuclear technology transferred pursuant to such agreement, will be used for any nuclear explosive device, or for research on or development of any nuclear explosive device, or for any other military purpose;

(4) Except in the case of those agreements for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c. and agreements for cooperation with nuclear-weapon states, a stipulation that the United States shall have the right to require the return of any nuclear materials and equipment transferred pursuant thereto and any special nuclear material produced through the use thereof if the cooperating party detonates a nuclear explosive device or terminates or abrogates an agreement providing for IAEA safeguards;

(5) A guaranty by the cooperating party that any material or any Restricted Data transferred pursuant to the agreement for cooperation and, except in the case of agreements arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., 144 b. or 144 c., any production or utilization facility transferred pursuant to the agreement for cooperation or any special nuclear material produced through the use of any such facility or through the use of any material transferred pursuant to the agreement, will not be transferred to unauthorized persons or beyond the jurisdiction or control of the cooperating party without the consent of the United States;

(6) A guaranty by the cooperating party that adequate physical security will be maintained with respect to any nuclear material transferred pursuant to such agreement and with respect to any special nuclear material used in or produced through the use of any material, production facility, or utilization facility transferred pursuant to such agreement;

(7) Except in the case of agreements for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., 144 b. or 144 c., a guaranty by the cooperating party that no material transferred pursuant to the agreement for cooperation and no material used in or produced through the use of any material, production facility, or utilization facility transferred pursuant to the agreement for cooperation will be reprocessed, enriched or (in the case of plutonium, uranium 233, or uranium enriched to greater then twenty percent in the isotope 235, or other nuclear materials which have been irradiated) otherwise altered in form or content without the prior approval of the United States;

(8) Except in the case of agreements for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., 144 b. or 144 c., a guaranty by the cooperating party that no plutonium, no uranium 233, and no uranium enriched to greater then twenty percent in the isotope 235, transferred pursuant to the agreement for cooperation, or recovered from any source or special nuclear material so transferred or from any source or special nuclear material used in any production facility or utilization facility transferred pursuant to the agreement for cooperation, will be stored in any facility that has not been approved in advance by the United States; and

(9) Except in the case of agreements for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., 144 b., or 144 c., a guaranty by the cooperating party that any special nuclear material, production facility, or utilization facility produced or constructed under the jurisdiction of the cooperating party by or through the use of any sensitive nuclear technology transferred pursuant to such agreement for cooperation will be subject to all the requirements specified in this subsection.

The President may exempt a proposed agreement for cooperation (except an agreement arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., 144 b., or 144 c.) from any of the requirements of the foregoing sentence if he determines that inclusion of any such requirement would be seriously prejudicial to the achievement of United States non-proliferation objectives or otherwise jeopardize the common defense and security. Except in the case of those agreements for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., 144 b., or 144 c., any proposed agreement for cooperation shall be negotiated by the Secretary of State, with the technical assistance and concurrence of the Secretary of Energy and in consultation with the Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency ("the Director"); and after consultation with the Commission shall be submitted to the President jointly by the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Energy accompanied by the views and recommendations of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Energy, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and the Director, who shall also provide to the President an unclassified Nuclear Proliferation Assessment Statement regarding the adequacy of the safeguards and other control mechanisms and the peaceful use assurances contained in the agreement for cooperation to ensure that any assistance furnished thereunder will not be used to further any military or nuclear explosive purpose. In the case of those agreements for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., 144 b., or 144 c., any proposed agreement for cooperation shall be submitted to the President by the Secretary of Energy or, in the case of those agreements for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c. or 144 b. which are to be implemented by the Department of Defense, by the Secretary of Defense;

b. The President has approved and authorized the execution of the proposed agreement for cooperation and has made a determination in writing that the performance of the proposed agreement will promote, and will not constitute an unreasonable risk to, the common defense and security;

c. The proposed agreement for cooperation (if not an agreement subject to subsection d.) together with the approval and determination of the President, has been submitted to the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate for a period of thirty days of continuous session (as defined in subsection 130 g.): Provided, however, That these committees, after having received such agreement for cooperation, may by resolution in writing waive the conditions of all or any portion of such thirty-day period; and

d. The proposed agreement for cooperation (if arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., 144 b., or 144 c., of if entailing implementation of section 53, 54 a., 103, or 104 in relation to a reactor that may be capable of producing more than five thermal megawatts or special nuclear material for use in connection therewith) has been submitted to the Congress, together with the approval and determination of the President, for a period of sixty days of continuous session (as defined in subsection 130 g. of this Act) and referred to the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, and in addition, in the case of a proposed agreement for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., 144 b., or 144 c., the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate, but such proposed agreement for cooperation shall not become effective if during such sixty-day period the Congress adopts a concurrent resolution stating in substance that the Congress does not favor the proposed agreement for cooperation: Provided, That the sixty-day period shall not begin until a Nuclear Proliferation Assessment Statement prepared by the Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, when required by subsection 123 a., has been submitted to the Congress. Any such proposed agreement for cooperation shall be considered pursuant to the procedures set forth in section 130 of this Act for the consideration of Presidential submissions.

Following submission of a proposed agreement for cooperation (except an agreement for cooperation arranged pursuant to subsection 91 c., 144 b., or 144c.) to the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Department of State, the Department of Energy, the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, and the Department of Defense shall, upon the request of either of those committees promptly furnish to those committees their views as to whether the safeguards and other controls contained therein provide an adequate framework to ensure that any exports as contemplated by such agreement will not be inimical to or consititute an unreasonable risk to the common defense and security.

If, after the date of enactment of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978, the Congress fails to disapprove a proposed agreement for cooperation which exempts the recipient nation from the requirement set forth in subsection 123 a. (2), such failure to act shall constitute a failure to adopt a resolution of disapproval pursuant to subsection 182 b. (3) for purposes of the Commission's consideration of applications and requests under section 126 a. (2) and there shall be no congressional review pursuant to section 128 of any subsequent license or authorization with respect to that state until the first such license or authorization which is issued after twelve months from the elapse of the sixty-day period in which the agreement for cooperation in question is reviewed by the Congress.●

A TRIBUTE TO JOHN REUTER

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to pay tribute to John Reuter, who a few weeks ago was awarded the highly esteemed Papal Knight of St. Gregory by Pope John Paul II.

John Reuter richly deserves this honor. He is a dedicated family man, and one of the most effective individuals in the State of New Jersey in the ongoing effort to restore legal protection for the most vulnerable among us, the unborn.

Mr. Speaker, I have worked with John for more than 10 years in the Pro-Life movement. I can say without any equivocation that he is one of the most persistent, hard-working, and compassionate leaders in the Pro-Life cause. For more than a decade he has been an inspiration to both my wife, Marie, and me in the battle to protect innocent human life.

Moreover Mr. Speaker, John Reuter is a true defender of the Catholic faith. He is an outstanding role model for the younger generation. Clearly his work record is impressive. He retired in 1973 after distinguished service as a public servant in the State of New Jersey for 42 years. In 1966 he retired from the New Jersey National Guard as a lieutenant colonel, having risen from the rank of private.

Mr. Speaker, for many years John was a member of the board of directors of the New Jersey Right to Life Committee, which is where I got to know and admire him, having served on that board as well. He was always the voice of reason and consistency. He was unflappable.

Mr. Speaker, John Reuter was born in Trenton, N.J., on June 7, 1913, and graduated from Trenton Evening School in 1933. On October 30, 1937, he married Catherine Grimm of East Orange, N.J. They have six children, Mary Ann, Lawrence, Joan, Catherine, Therese and John, Jr.

In 1948 the Reuter family moved to a larger residence in Crosswicks, N.J., to accommodate their growing family. It was named Maryacres in honor of the Blessed Mother. They became members of St. Mary's Parish in Bordentown, N.J., with the children attending St. Mary's Grammar School. In 1955 they became members of St. Vincent dePaul Church in Yardville, N.J.

While at St. Anthony's Parish in Trenton, John Reuter became a member of the St. Vincent dePaul Society. He later was a charter member of the St. Vincent dePaul Conference, Yardville. The conference celebrated its 25th anniversary last year. John is the current president.

He is presently treasurer and acting secretary of the Trenton Diocesan Council of the Society. For many years he was chairman of the Social Service Center Committee of Mercer District Council until the council stores closed in 1975. He also writes and edits the Burlington County Right to Life Newsletter.

A member of the Knights of Columbus since 1951, Bordentown Council 570, John was received into the Fourth Degree in March 1975. During most of his married life he has been a member of the Holy Name Society, serving at various times as president and secretary. He currently also serves as a lector in St. Vincent dePaul Parish.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, John Reuter is a champion of the Catholic faith, a true defender of human rights and I am proud to be counted among his many, many friends.●

ACCESS CHARGES FOR LONG-DISTANCE CALLS

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, 184 of our colleagues joined Congressman Larry Craig and me in a letter to the Federal Communications Commission requesting that it hold off on imposing telephone access charges on our Nation's businesses.

If these charges go into effect now—at their present rate of up to $6 per line per month—many of our Nation's small businesses will pay more just for the privilege of having the opportunity to make long-distance calls than they pay for the long-distance calls they actually make.

Mr. Chairman, supporters of the access charges on business originally said long-distance rates would go down by 10.5 percent or more if the access charge plan were implemented. But last weekend, in an article printed in the Washington Post, Chairman Fowler of the FCC said any long-distance rate reductions would be significantly less.

Mr. Chairman, the present plan to put telephone access charges on small business is bad news and will greatly hamper the effort to stimulate economic growth in our country.●

THE RETIREMENT OF MAJ. GEN. JOHN J. KOEHLER

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to announce the retirement of an individual who has been a great contributor and leader in the U.S. Army for three decades: Maj. Gen. John J. Koehler, Jr. On May 1, 1984, Major General Koehler will end his tenure as commander of the U.S. Army Test and Evaluation Command (Tecom) at Aberdeen-Edgewood Proving Grounds (APG), located in my district. Taking the position as commander in 1979, Koehler has held that position longer than anyone in Tecon's 22-year history. His retirement will be a substantial loss to Tecom, to APG, and to the entire military establishment.

Tecom tests proposed weapons and equipment at nine installations in the United States and the Republic of Panama. As commander, Koehler oversaw an organization which manages and controls more than 6 million acres of real estate and associated air space, employs an annual operating budget exceeding $750 million, completes more than 900 tests annually, and employs a military and civilian work force of almost 12,000 people.

As commander, Koehler worked hard to improve public awareness of the military's role and purpose, particularly with regards to Tecom. He did this by doing more than merely running an organization the size of Tecom; his regimen went way beyond the strenous day-to-day requirements of the job. This included giving speeches across the country to a wide variety of groups and organizations, hosting visitors at APG from around the world, and initiating the Tecom sabbatical and academic program for college and university faculty members and graduate students.

Major General Koehler began his army career upon enlistment in 1944. He later entered the U.S. Military Academy at West Point and was commissioned a lieutenant of field artillery upon graduation in 1950. He served on assignments in Europe and Korea. In 1969 and 1970, he served with the Office of the Assistant to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for Strategic Arms Negotiations, participating as an adviser to the U.S. SALT delegation at Helsinki and Vienna. In 1975, he was appointed Assistant Chief of Staff for Operations and Training of the 8th U.S. Army and Assistant Chief of Staff for Operations and Training of the U.N. Command and of the U.S. forces in the Republic of Korea. By 1977, he was promoted to Chief of Staff for the U.N. Command and of U.S. forces in Korea. Just prior to becoming commander at Tecom, he was the commander general of the U.S. Army Air Defense Center at Fort Bliss.

Major General Koehler has been the recipient of numerous medals recognizing his tremendous courage and dedication to his country including the Silver Star, the Legion of Merit, the Meritorious Service Medal, the Joint Service Commendation Medal, the Army Commendation Medal, and the Purple Heart.

As commander of Tecom, he has displayed enormous integrity in the management of developmental testing and reportings of tests of new equipment. He supervised all nine subordinate installations and completed all missions while staying completely within his budget guidelines, quite an accomplishment considering the magnitude of the Tecom organization. He greatly improved the quality of life for all military personnel and their dependents at APG and substantially upgraded the working conditions for civilian employees. His service to the Army and to his country is immeasurable. I congratulate him on his long and outstanding career and know he will be sorely missed by all who had the privilege of working with him. My best wishes to Major General Koehler, his wife Helen, and their nine children for continued happiness and success in all their future endeavors.●

SOUTHFIELD SENIOR HIGH SCHOOL FINALIST IN OUTSTANDING SCHOOLS COMPETITION

HON. SANDER M. LEVIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, much has been said on this floor in recent months on the need to improve our Nation's schools. Too often we forget that, standing firmly in the path of the "rising tide of mediocrity," there are many, many outstanding schools, staffed by dedicated teachers and administrators who tirelessly strive to provide their charges with the finest education possible. For this reason, I applaud the U.S. Department of Education's national secondary school recognition program.

This program provides national recognition to outstanding senior and junior high schools across the country. Each year the Department asks the States to nominate secondary schools that they believe merit special recognition. From this pool of nominees the Secretary of Education selects finalists for further consideration. Finally, in the fall of the year the Secretary will announce those schools selected as exceptional examples of secondary education. These schools are then added to the network of schools that can serve as models for other schools and school districts that are seeking to improve.

This year, Michigan nominated nine senior high schools and nine junior high schools. Last month, the Secretary selected 14 of these schools as finalists. It was my distinct pleasure that Southfield Senior High School in my district was among those schools to be so honored.

I have long been aware of the excellent program which Southfield Senior High School offers its students. The teachers, administrators, parents and students of this school can be justly proud of their accomplishments. I am proud to represent them in Washington. I want to take this opportunity to extend my sincere congratulations to Southfield Senior High School and to wish them the best of luck in the remainder of the competition.●

SUPPORT FOR POPULATION RESEARCH BUDGET

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this statement is to describe H.R. 5335, a bill I introduced on April 3 to encourage interest in and attention to the Federal investment in population and contraceptive research by proposing the establishment within NIH of a new Institute on Population and Human Reproduction. Such an institute would replace the work in this field by the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development (NICHD), which has been the source of NIH support for population research since the 1960's.

I have several reasons for introducing H.R. 5335 at this time:

First, section 1004 of title X establishes the only explicit authorization for support for population research by the Department of Health and Human Services. In fact, until 1981, title X's authorization contained the funding authorization for NICHD's population research budget in addition to the policy authorization. Thus, it is especially appropriate to raise the issue of the adequacy of Government support for population research before this subcommittee as it reviews title X.

Second, new studies indicate the continuing inadequacy of available methods of contraception. According to Howard W. Ory of the U.S. Centers for Disease Control, more than half of all pregnancies in the United States are unintended, despite the fact that most couples use some method of family planning. As a consequence, in 1980, 1.54 million abortions were chosen by women to terminate their pregnancies. In my own State of Wisconsin, almost 22,000 abortions were performed that year.

The main reason is contraceptive failure and nonuse of contraception. For example, an estimated 2.4 percent of married women using oral contraceptives become pregnant during the first year of pill use; 18.6 percent of the users of the diaphragm do. In addition, an estimated 3 million women at risk of unintended pregnancy do not use any method of contraception; nearly 40 percent do so because of their concern about the side effects associated with the use of different methods of contraception.

Third, the costs of unintended pregnancy are not only personal but also public. When low-income women experience unintended pregnancy, the costs are not only significant to themselves but also to public agencies if they are compelled to seek public assistance to care for their families.

That is why the Federal investment in contraceptive services is so valued; every $1 invested prevents the need for an estimated $2 of public expenditures for public health care, welfare payments, food assistance, and public housing during the following year.

Fourth, since 1981, the Office of Technology Assessment (OTA) has reported that a number of new developments in contraception await only additional investment to be realized. In its report, "World Population and Fertility Planning Technologies," OTA stated, "Added investments in this specific area are highly likely to produce payoffs in the form of useful new technologies. * * * An additional $20 million annually in this specific field could have a substantial impact."

Fifth, NICHD is the world's major source of funding for contraceptive research, but its budget has declined during the past 4 years. According to OTA, more than 50 percent of the expenditure for contraceptive research and development in the world is financed by the U.S. Government. Most of that support is provided by NICHD, and the institute spends most of its $92 million population research budget for basic research in the reproductive sciences. It uses only about $8.2 million for the development of better contraception and $3.1 million for the evaluation of contraceptive safety and effectiveness. Funding for both has declined. The administration's fiscal year 1985 budget request for contraceptive development by NICHD is 9 percent below the fiscal 1981 budget; its request for contraceptive evaluation is 25 percent below the 1981 budget.

Sixth, as a new Member of Congress, this hearing and the introduction of H.R. 5335 represent my first opportunity to contribute to the important public discussion about encouragement of contraceptive research. My support for greater discussion about the adequacy of our investment in contraceptive research reflects my longstanding interest in family planning, borne of my many years of experience working and living around the world. I make no claims of expertise in either the area of contraceptive research or the organization of NIH, but I am eager to improve the availability of choice that is so essential to the lives and well-being of virtually all Americans.

THE PURPOSE OF INTRODUCING H.R. 5335

Although the U.S. Government also provides funding for contraceptive research through the U.S. Agency for International Development, NICHD is the key player in supporting population research and contraceptive development worldwide. I have introduced H.R. 5335 to spark greater attention to both the adequacy of NICHD support for such research and the institutional obstacles inherent in the organization of NIH that stand in the way of a stronger investment in the field.

I believe we need to give higher priority to contraceptive research. H.R. 5335 is organized to highlight several goals that need to be considered:

First, greater visibility should be given to population research in general as an area of support provided by NIH. Currently, less than 3 percent of NIH's $4.5 billion budget is devoted to population research.

Second, greater visibility and priority specifically should be given to support for contraceptive research. Currently, combined NICHD funding for both contraceptive development and evaluation, which are applied research rather than the NIH preferred basic research, amounts to less than 0.4 percent of NIH's total budget.

Third, continued strong support for and coordination with research for mothers and children, which now receives the majority of NICHD's annual funding. Historically, approximately 60 percent of NICHD's funding has been devoted to research on mothers and children, as distinct from population research.

Fourth, increased attention to long-range goals and priorities for population research in connection with research on mothers and children. The issue is not simply a question of funding but also of NIH priorities for different fields of research as well as the balance maintained between basic research, which is NIH's top priority, and applied research, which invariably suffers in the budget-making process regardless of its specific merit.

THE SPECIFICS OF H.R. 5335

The goals I have listed must be the focus of any discussion about improving our commitment to contraceptive research in a meaningful way. H.R. 5335 contains several elements that have been designed specifically to call attention to these goals:

First, the creation of a new Institute on Population and Human Reproduction.

Second, a detailed authorization, including specific provision for the Institute on Population and Human Reproduction, and increased funding for the remaining work of NICHD, which specifically earmarks 25 percent of the budget of the population institute to be devoted to contraceptive development and evaluation.

Third, the creation of a National Science Policy Committee on Human Development with special coordinating responsibilities for the budgets and planning for the work of the Population Institute and NICHD.●

DAVID ANTHONY KENNEDY

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, few families in the history of our Republic have sustained a commitment to public service with the courage and the continued concern for others as have the members of the Kennedy family. For several generations, they have involved themselves in the conflicts of public life, and as a nation we have come to know their triumphs and tragedies.

So it saddens me today to note the untimely death of David Anthony Kennedy, the fourth child of the late Senator Robert F. Kennedy of New York, at the age of 28.

The deaths of President Kennedy and Senator Kennedy shocked the Nation. How much more profound that shock must have been for their family, for those who knew them as only a child could know his father and his uncle? This tragic death, of so young a man, brings expressions of sorrow for his family from every corner of the country.

I never met David Kennedy, but I have known and admired members of his family for many years. I know our hearts go out to them in this difficult hour. May they find comfort in their grief, as in the past they have comforted the American people in our hours of national grief. As they lay David to eternal peace, we remember the calming words of Lord Tennyson: "God's finger touched him, and he slept."●

PROJECT GRADUATION

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, we are fast approaching that time of year that I, as a former high schoolteacher, principal, athletic coach, and school superintendent, still anticipate with a sense of foreboding: high school prom and graduation season.

"Why such grim talk?" You must wonder. After all, thoughts of another school year's end bring to mind warm weather, baseball season, class rings, the senior prom, flowers, formals, and those coveted mortar boards. All of this accompanied by seemingly unending refrains of that classic favorite, "Pomp and Circumstance."

I speak with foreboding because in Pennsylvania, almost 20 percent of 1983's fatal alcohol-related teenage accidents occurred in May or June; 32 teenagers died in those drunk driving accidents, with June reporting the highest percentage—10.91 percent, or 18 deaths—of any month that year.

That is why I am very pleased to announce that Penn State All-American halfback Curt Warner will appear with me at Carlisle Senior High School from 10:30–11:10 a.m. on Monday, April 30, to talk with the 900-member student body about the dangers of drinking and driving.

This high school assembly, which is cosponsored by the Cumberland-Perry County Drug and Alcohol Commission, is designed to bring attention to the serious problem of teenage drunken driving, particularly during the prom season and a little over 1 month before graduation nights throughout the 19th District and around the country.

I have asked Mr. Warner, the 1983 American Football Conference Rookie of the Year with the Seattle Seahawks, to speak to the Carlisle High School students because I truly believe that he is the best role model for teens in the 15-, 16-, and 17-year-old age group. Not only does he represent the virtues of clean living, but Curt is also as well known and respected as any athlete in Pennsylvania today.

These youngsters need role models and more than ever when it comes to alcohol and drug abuse. In the 1982 "senior season," the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation Accident Data Bureau indicates that the highest number of alcohol-related accidents involving teenagers occurred in May: 710, or 9.85 percent. In June 1982, there were 603—8.377 percent—accidents resulting from teenage drunken driving.

My personal experience with the heartbreak that can accompany the high school graduation season stems from my many years as superintendent of Spring Grove schools, principal at West York Area Senior High School, and before that, as teacher and counselor at Kennard-Dale High. All too often, some of my students crossed the border into Maryland, which had a lower minimum drinking age, "to celebrate"—and met their deaths in senseless and tragic automobile accidents.

Clearly, the time is ripe for precautions to prevent future such tragedies.

Curt Warner will be speaking to the students about dealing with this national epidemic on two levels—first, by talking about the benefit of parents and teenagers sitting down to sign safety contracts, and second, by promoting Project Graduation, an idea developed by the U.S. Department of Transportation National Highway Traffic Safety Administration.

Project Graduation is a growing movement whereby high school seniors plan ways in which to celebrate their last month of high school with alcohol-free and chemical-free events. It is the outgrowth of a tragic graduation season in Maine in which, in one community alone, seven teenagers were killed, one was paralyzed and comatose, and several others were arrested for operating vehicles under the influence—all in the 2 weeks prior to graduation night.

This graduation season, I hope that we can change these statistics and prevent tragic deaths, injuries, and accidents.

My message to the class of 1984: Please do not drink and drive, and please do not drive with anyone else who has been drinking.●

TRIBUTE TO RT. REV. WILLIAM MILTON SMITH

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 4, 1984, the New York Conference/African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church will honor the Rt. Rev. William Milton Smith at the Rye Town Hilton in Port Chester, N.Y. More than 1,000 people are expected to attend the event.

Bishop Smith, the senior bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, resides with his wife, Ida, in Mobile, Ala.

In May 1980, Bishop Smith was appointed by the general conference to serve as presiding prelate of the New York Annual Conference, First Episcopal District.

Bishop Smith presently serves as chairman of the church extension board, on the Board of Trustees of Livingston College and as national chairman of the Centennial Campaign of Livingston College and Hood Seminary. he is also vice chairman of the Publishing House and Lay Activities and is a trustee of the Lomax-Hannon College.

Additionally, Bishop Smith serves on the Board of Directors of the Commonwealth National Bank, the National Board of the NAACP, Mobile United, the United Fund of Mobile County, America's Junior Miss Pageant, Inc., on the Governing Board of the National Council of Christ in America, the Executive Board of World Methodist Council, the Dearborn Street YMCA, on the Mayor's Commission on Progress of Mobile and the Steering Committee of the NAACP.

Prior to his coming to the First Episcopal District, Bishop Smith presided over the Western North Carolina and the West Alabama Conferences.

The New York Conference is comprised of the following churches in my home, Westchester County; St. Catherine's in Mount Vernon; St. Francis in Port Chester; Barry Avenue in Mamaroneck; Greater Centennial in Mount Vernon; Institutional in Yonkers; Metropolitan in Yonkers; Mount Hope in White Plains; Foster Memorial in Tarrytown; Dixon Mission in Yonkers; Ossining Mission in Ossining, and Park Street in Peekskill. Long involved in social outreach and community development, these Westchester churches have and continue to be a valuable asset to Westchester County. BEVERLY BAIN HONORED

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, on June 9, 1984, Valley Beth Shalom of Encino, Calif., will honor Beverly Bain as Woman of the Year.

Beverly Bain has been active in the field of music. As a public school music teacher she advanced the theory that informed listeners are as important as the performers of good music. As a PTA president and music chairperson, she worked hard to promote excellence and to instill the necessity of music in the public schools.

Beverly is an accomplished musician in her own right. She is an organist, pianist and a director and teacher of Israeli and Yiddish music. As the president of Valley Beth Shalom, she developed guidelines for participation by temple members in music.

Beverly Bain's contributions to the promotion of women's participation in Jewish life have been impressive. She was the coordinator of the Jewish Reconstruction Foundation for the Western Region, where she worked for equality for women in Jewish religious practice. She is presently involved in preparing a program for the adaptation of traditional Jewish life for the modern Jew.

I ask the Members to join Beverly Bain's friends in honoring her contributions to her religion, her community, her concern for the equality of women, and her devotion to the progress of young musicians.●

PROHIBIT TURNING PLOWSHARES INTO NUCLEAR WEAPONS

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1984

● Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I am today placing in the RECORD an excellent article which appeared in the April 27, 1984, issue of Science, published by the American Association for the Advancement of Science. The article, written by Colin Norman, is entitled "Congress, DOE Battle Over British Plutonium."

It details efforts of my colleague, DICK OTTINGER, over the past year to prevent the Department of Energy from diverting plutonium that is now being used for peaceful energy research into nuclear weapons. I commend the article to my colleagues in the House.

The article follows:

CONGRESS, DOE BATTLE OVER BRITISH PLUTONIUM

DOE REFUSES TO GIVE UP THE OPTION OF USING PLUTONIUM FROM THE CIVILIAN R&D PROGRAM, INCLUDING 4 TONS IMPORTED FROM BRITAIN, TO MAKE WEAPONS

A battle between the Department of Energy and Representative Richard Ottinger (D-N.Y.) over the fate of about 8 tons of plutonium in DOE's civilian R & D program could embarrass the British government and cause strained relations between Britain and the United States. Ottinger, arguing that civilian and military nuclear programs should be kept separate, wants to stop DOE from using the plutonium to make weapons. DOE maintains, however, that the material may be needed for the Reagan Administration's weapons buildup.

Britain's stake in this dispute stems from the fact that about 4 tons of the plutonium was transferred from Britain to the United States between 1964 and 1971 under a 1958 agreement "on the uses of atomic energy for mutual defense purposes." It was bartered for highly enriched uranium and tritium, which was used in Britain's defense program.

Although DOE officials have said they do not know the source of the plutonium, British statements indicate that it came from civilian magnox reactors. The agreement provides for use of the bartered plutonium for military purposes, but the British government has repeatedly sought assurances that it would be used only in civilian programs.

The first of these assurances came in April 1964, when Sir Alec Douglas-Home, who was then Britain's Prime Minister, said in a statement in the House of Commons that "I am informed by the United States Government that they have no intention of using the plutonium received from us for weapons purposes." A similar commitment was given in 1982, when Britain's Secretary of State for Energy, John Moore, told Parliament that U.S. authorities had confirmed that the British plutonium was all in the civilian R & D program. Finally, on 5 March, U.S. Energy Secretary Donald Hodel said in a letter to Ottinger that "It has been and is the policy of this Department not to use this material for weapons."

In spite of these assurances, however, DOE is fighting a proposal by Ottinger that would make it illegal to transfer the British-origin plutonium to the military program. DOE officials have told Ottinger that they do not want to give up the option of using the plutonium for weapons production some time in the future, according to congressional sources. Moreover, DOE documents and recently declassified testimony indicate that, at least as recently as last year, the department was planning to use the material to produce nuclear weapons.

Ottinger originally proposed that every scrap of plutonium used or produced in civilian R & D facilities in the United States should be placed off limits for "any nuclear explosive purpose." Language to that effect is included in legislation now pending before the Committee on Energy and Commerce, which is expected to vote on it soon after Congress returns on 24 April from its Easter recess. Ottinger has recently offered to modify his proposal, however, to permit the transfer to military programs of virtually all the plutonium currently in the civilian R & D program, except for the British-origin material. DOE is opposing even this measure.

There are currently between 7 and 8 metric tons of plutonium in the civilian R&D program. About half of it is in the core of the Zero Power Production Reactor (ZPPR) in Idaho; 2.9 metric tons has been fabricated into fuel elements for the Fast Flux Text Facility (FFTF) at Hanford, Washington; and the balance is in a variety of smaller programs. The bulk of the British plutonium is believed to be in the ZPPR core and some is in the FFTF cores.

Virtually all this material contains relatively large amounts of the nonfissile isotope plutonium-240, and is thus undesirable for making weapons. But in testimony before the House Armed Services Committee in March last year, Herman Roser, the head of DOE's weapons programs said DOE intended to convert it to weapons grade by blending some with so-called supergrade plutonium from the military program and running the rest through a laser separation plant in the late 1980's or early 1990's. His testimony, which was recently declassified, made clear that DOE was planning to convert all the plutonium from the civilian R & D program, including the British-origin material, into weapons.

Further evidence of DOE's intentions comes from an internal planning document produced in 1978 and recently turned over to Ottinger. It indicates that DOE was planning to transfer 3.4 metric tons of plutonium from the ZPPR core—where most of the British plutonium is said to reside—to military programs in 1986.

Ottinger is concerned that transfer of any plutonium from the civilian R & D program into weapons production would undermine U.S. nonproliferation policy by blurring the distinction between civilian and military programs. Last year, Congress passed a bill making it illegal for DOE to use plutonium produced in civilian nuclear power plants for military purposes, and Ottinger's proposal is designed to extend the same prohibition to plutonium used in the civilian R & D program.

DOE objected on the grounds that the U.S. plutonium currently in the R & D program was produced originally in defense reactors and there is a commitment to return it to the military. In other words, DOE claims it is technically military plutonium on loan to civilian programs. If Ottinger's proposal were passed by Congress, DOE warned, the department would be forced to reclaim three cores that have been fabricated for FFTF but which are so far unused and thus technically not covered by the proposal. This would effectively bring the FFTF program to a screeching halt.

Ottinger bowed to DOE's pressure and offered to modify his proposal by exempting all U.S. plutonium currently in the civilian R & D program that was originally produced in military reactors. This would permit the eventual transfer back to defense programs of U.S.-origin material but would outlaw any military use of the British-origin plutonium and would prohibit future shuffling back and forth between civilian and defense programs.

DOE has refused to accept the compromise, however. Although DOE said in a letter to Ottinger dated 5 March that it is not relying on the British-origin plutonium to meet its weapons needs, DOE officials told Ottinger's staff that they do not want to relinquish that option. This was repeated by Hodel in a meeting on 5 April, according to Ottinger's aides. Ottinger subsequently outlined DOE's objections in a letter to Hodel and asked him to confirm them in writing. Hodel had not responded by the time Congress recessed on 13 April.

Ottinger's proposal is supported by a broad array of groups and individuals including the Federation of American Scientists, the Environmental Policy Institute, the National Resources Defense Council, former CIA deputy director Herbert Scoville, and MIT defense expert George Rathjens. Their principal concern is that continued swapping of plutonium between military and civilian programs will seriously compromise efforts to prevent the spread to nuclear weapons. "How can we persuade other nations to forego the use in weapons of plutonium from their civilian research programs if we are doing so here?" sixteen citizens' groups said in a letter to Ottinger supporting his proposal.

They have also questioned the need for the plutonium in the weapons program. "The idea that we need this plutonium is just ridiculous," contends Rathjens. He points out that the Administration can recycle plutonium from 2000 warheads it has recently removed from Europe and that the decision to abandon the Clinch River Breeder Reactor will greatly lessen plutonium requirements in the late 1980's and early 1990's. The R & D plutonium would only be needed to build "every weapon that's on everybody's wish list," he says.

The British government would also, presumably, welcome passage of Ottinger's proposal. In recent weeks critics of Britain's nuclear power program have raised numerous allegations about the possible military use of the country's civilian plutonium exports and British officials have reiterated assurances from U.S. authorities that there are no plans to use the material in weapons.

Yet, to the potential embarrassment of the British government, DOE officials have been telling Ottinger that they do not want to relinquish the option of using British-origin plutonium in the weapons program. If DOE does ever decide to use the material, that could put a serious dent in U.S.-British relations. Ottinger's proposal would at least preclude that possibility.●

TRIBUTE TO MATT ROMEO

(Mr. HOYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, on April 1, a great leader of the labor movement in Maryland and a good and close friend of mine passed away. I speak of the death of Matthew R. Romeo.

Matt was officially the financial secretary and treasurer of Local 100 of the Sheet Metal Workers Union. Unofficially, he was a major force behind the goals of strengthening the labor movement in Maryland and the District of Columbia, and in constructing from that movement a dynamic and influential force in our community.

His work as a cochairman of Local 100's apprenticeship training fund was critical to the successful operation of the training of apprentices in sheet metal work. His activities as chairman of the Washington Building Trades' Committee on Political Education for the past 8 years greatly enhanced the powers wielded by that group.

For 6 years, Matt served his union well as a member of the executive board of the Maryland State and District of Columbia AFL–CIO and as an executive board member of the Metropolitan Washington Central Labor Council. In 1980, he was named "Man of the Year" by the Washington building trades for his work. He has served as the sergeant-at-arms for that body from 1976 to 1982.

But Matt's concerns did not focus solely on his trade. He was a devout Catholic, and he used his abilities as a fundraiser to aid many charities. Most recently, he was involved with the Leukemia Society and helped raise substantial moneys for the Leukemia Radiothon.

Matt had a very close family and he and his beloved wife, Mary Ellen, were always ready to help at any call for assistance.

My relationship with Matt began just a few years ago. But it soon developed into a close friendship. His loss is a very personal one for me and for my wife, Judy. All who knew him, considered Matt to be one of the warmest, most caring, and most decent persons they know. His loss, therefore, is more keenly felt by us all.

Mr. Speaker, Matt Romeo was a fine man, and his contributions to his community and to his work will long be remembered. I know my colleagues would want to join me in sending heartfelt condolences to his family on this sad occasion.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 5188, as amended, presently under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5188, a bill authorizing fiscal year 1985 appropriations for the U.S. International Trade Commission (ITC), the U.S. Customs Service, and the U.S. Trade Representative.

The bill as amended by the committee authorizes $28,410,000 for the fiscal year 1985 appropriation to the International Trade Commission, the amount requested by the Commission, and authorizes the use of funds for rental of conference space in the District of Columbia and minimal representation funds. This amount represents an increase of $6.3 million over that appropriated for fiscal year 1984, largely to fund the planned relocation and consolidation of the Commission and to add an additional 44 full-time permanent positions to strengthen the Commission's ability to carry out its statutory responsibilities.

Because of the Commission's unique charter as an independent, quasi-judicial body to resolve trade disputes and render important determinations under various U.S. trade laws, Congress has provided that the agency's budget be submitted directly to us rather than subject to control by OMB. The process has worked very well, and the agency has a well-deserved reputation for presenting lean, responsible budget requests. This year's request is no exception. The Commission has had a dramatic increase both in caseload and congressional and Presidental requests for special studies and factfinding investigations due to growing trade problems. Further, the Commission will experience substantial relocation expenses as a result of pending legislation to transfer its building to the Smithsonian Institution. The committee therefore believes this funding level is essential to meet the Commission's needs.

Section 2 of the bill authorizes $686,399,000 in appropriations for the U.S. Customs Service for fiscal year 1985. This amount represents an increase of $84 million over the amount requested by the President, which would have required a reduction in force of 954 customs inspectors, import specialists, and other personnel and a reduction in Customs' funding of the air interdiction program.

This authorization level will not only restore these cuts, but will provide sufficient funds for Customs to hire additional personnel to cope with the growing workload of passengers and cargo and to operate and maintain the Customs air program. The total amount authorized by the bill for the air program is $28.1 million.

The committee is concerned about the adverse impact that increasing illegal imports are having on the American public, and is concerned that Customs effectively enforce U.S. trade law. This budget, together with continuing active committee oversight, will provide the foundation for such enforcement.

The bill, as amended by the committee, also limits to $11 million the amount of authorized funds which Customs may expend for the implementation of Operation Exodus and other export enforcement programs. The committee believes that the amount authorized will be sufficient to operate an effective program in conjunction with other agencies having jurisdiction over the administration and enforcement of export control laws.

The committee also amended the bill to preclude any proposed final rule revising or eliminating sureties on customs bonds from taking effect until 90 calendar days after Customs' submission of a report to Congress.

In addition, the bill places a $25,000 cap on the amount that customs inspectors can earn in overtime pay, but permits the Commissioner of Customs to waive this limitation under certain circumstances.

The committee also adopted an amendment to provide for public disclosure of certain import manifest information.

Finally, section 3 of the bill, as amended, authorizes $14,179,000 for the U.S. Trade Representative (USTR) for fiscal year 1985, the amount requested by the agency.

These three agencies are central to U.S. trade policy development and its administration. The Subcommittee on Trade which I chair, and the full Committee on Ways and Means maintain close and continual oversight of their activities. As in past years, we have reviewed their budget requests in depth and have approved authorization levels for fiscal 1985 which are lean yet adequate to insure they get their essential jobs done.

We strongly believe adequate funding for these agencies is essential as international trade continues to grow in volume and in importance to the U.S. economy. The need for effective enforcement of our trade laws by the Customs Service has never been greater than it is today. An increase in Customs manpower and an improved management philosophy in the allocation of its resources is essential to protect American business, workers, and consumers from the enormous increase in counterfeit imports and other forms of unfair trade. Mr. Speaker, we need a tough, well-financed Customs Service with the training and expertise to regulate properly the huge flow of goods through our ports. We have worked closely with the business community and with many of our colleagues here in the House who want to see a more effective Customs Service. Adequate funding to handle our growing trade problems is absolutely essential, and therefore, I urge your support of H.R. 5188, as reported by the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the authorization bill we are considering today provides separately for the level of funding for three agencies as required by law. In fiscal year 1985, the Ways and Means Committee has recommended $686.4 million for the U.S. Customs Service, $28.4 million for the International Trade Commission, and $14.2 million for the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative.

Except for the Customs Service, these funds represent the amounts requested by the administration to cover spending needs for the next fiscal year. The authorized amount for the Customs Service is $84 million above the administration's request and more than 11 percent higher than the amount appropriated in fiscal year 1984 for this agency.

Because of the increased authorization for the Customs Service, the administration is opposed to H.R. 5188. The administration has asked that the bill not be considered under suspension of the rules, but that amendments be allowed to bring spending levels down, not only to the administration's request but also to the guidelines of the first concurrent budget resolution approved only 2 weeks ago. Of course, the authorization bill for these three agencies has traditionally been approved quickly without much debate or amendment. It is also true that the annual authorization bill is often ignored by the Senate authorizing committee and by both the House and Senate Appropriations Committees.

The result has been that the funding for these three agencies is approved quite independently from what we do today. During the last Congress, for example, the fiscal year 1984 authorization bill was finally agreed to by both Houses during the last hour of the last day of the session, far behind the appropriations process. One of the principal reasons this happens, in my view, is that we are not thoughtful or responsible about the funding increases we attempt to authorize.

The amount authorized for the Customs Service provides for 650 new positions next year, including additional customs inspectors, import specialists and customs patrol officers. At a time when tremendous efforts are being made to curb the mounting budget deficit, it is unrealistic to expect to achieve personnel increases that cannot be justified. Costly automation and other computerized equipment has been installed over the last few years and this, coupled with consolidation efforts that have been and will continue to be implemented, caused the administration to request fewer employees for this agency.

The Customs Service has important responsibilities, such as drug enforcement and monitoring of programs involving sensitive imports such as textiles, that will test its resources in fiscal year 1985. I hope that as we proceed with the appropriations process and as the Senate considers the authorization for this agency, we can work with the administration to find an acceptable level of funding. The resource needs of an agency with revenue raising functions should be met realistically, yet we cannot ignore the fiscal restraints of the budget process.

Mr. Speaker, I hope we can approve H.R. 5188 today, and that we will continue to work toward a lower buget deficit as the process continues.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. PEASE).

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly to support this bill and, in particular, to call attention to one section which would allow, or indeed require, certain information about imports coming into this country to be available for publishing by journals which are in the business of doing this sort of thing. The same provision was passed in our authorization bill last year. Unfortunately, that authorization bill never became law. So the subcommittee has seen fit to try again by putting the same language in this year's authorization bill.

Essentially, we are trying to help American companies, American ports, American importers to do a better job in some cases of competing with imports by making this information available to them on a routine basis through publishing houses.

There are ample provisions in the section to protect the proprietary interest of shippers and importers if they so make that request, but it would not be a blanket exemption from disclosure that would go on and on and on. It would have to be renewed at least every 2 years.

I think this amendment strikes a proper balance between disclosure of information which may be helpful to American companies and importers and manufacturers and port authorities at the same time that it protects the confidentiality of the shippers on those occasions when confidentiality is called for.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY.)

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this measure for two reasons. The first concern that I have is that this authorization is above the budget recommendation of the President. The extra money that the committee has seen fit to put in this bill is unnecessary and is not spent in the right place.

The second reason that I am concerned about this measure is that it ignores the previously expressed will of this House that the Soviet Union be condemned and penalized for its continued use of forced, slave labor in its concentration camps to manufacture goods that are imported by the United States.

There has been a great deal of documented proof that the use of slave labor is a fact and that it includes products that we buy here in America. I can think of no more repulsive idea than the thought that American citizens are supporting the continuation of slave camps and the forced repression of political dissidents by buying goods that these prisoners are tortured to produce. The American people have not been adequately told of this barbaric practice by the Soviets and the Commerce Department has not been given adequate incentive and funds to properly deal with these illicit goods.

I was a cosponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 100 last year which passed this House and I am a cosponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 277 which would give the Commerce Department strong support in their efforts to refuse slave produced goods as they come into this country. I feel that this bill should include the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 277 and that the extra spending it entails should be removed or at least shifted to enforcement of the law of the United States of America to refuse to import products manufactured with slave labor.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, in the development of this legislation, the Committee on Ways and Means heard testimony from many Members of Congress. One of the Members who testified before us was the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL), chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce. During the testimony of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL), certain questions were raised and I responded to those questions, and I responded in writing. I am including at this point in the RECORD the questions and the responses:

Mr. DINGELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding and wish to congratulate him and his subcommittee for a very important first step in the restoration of the ability of the U.S. Customs Service to police our trade laws. The Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations of the Commerce Committee which I Chair has thus far held 7 days of hearings on the impact of illegal and unfair foreign trade practices on interstate commerce. Our investigation demonstrated conclusively that American businesses and American jobs are being decimated by the illegal entry of goods into the United States. Even more important, the health and safety of American consumers are being threatened by a flood of piratical counterfeits from offshore sources. Despite an exceptionally dedicated group of civil servants which man our ports, foreign suppliers continue to scoff at our laws and threaten the economic and physical well-being of millions of American citizens.

The increase in the Customs budget to $686.4 million contained in H.R. 5188 is an important first step toward the full and fair enforcement of our laws. There are, however, a few points of clarification that I would like to discuss with the gentleman. Is it true that this bill would authorize about 650 new positions including 450 customs inspectors, 150 import specialists and 50 customs patrol officers, and would further specify that because of the growing importance of commercial fraud work, the Commissioner of Customs should assign these new positions to port facilities evidencing high potential growth in trade activity?

Mr. GIBBONS. I thank the gentleman for his kind words regarding the work of the Subcommittee on Trade on this bill. The budget level of $686.4 million for the Customs Service in fiscal year 1985 represents an increase of $84 million over that requested by the administration. In addition to restoring the administration's proposed cuts of about 954 Customs positions as well as cuts in other services, this budget would provide the necessary funds to create an additional 650 positions. We believe that this budget will provide the Customs Service with sufficient resources to effectively enforce our customs and trade laws and substantially reduce the number of illegal and counterfeit imports which are entering this country.

The report accompanying H.R. 5188 indicates that a portion of the increased funding is intended to fund about 650 new positions, including some 450 customs inspectors, 150 import specialists and 50 customs patrol officers. Recognizing the growing importance of commercial fraud work, the Commissioner of Customs is urged to assign the new personnel to port facilities evidencing high potential growth in trade activity.

Mr. DINGELL. Let me say at the outset that I believe that these new positions are sorely needed to combat this massive problem of Customs fraud; however, the bill does not fund any new positions for Customs agents. Is that correct?

Mr. GIBBONS. That is correct. However, in our view, the most effective utilization of Customs' resources in curtailing fraudulent importations is to provide a sufficient number of import specialists, inspectors and patrol officers at the ports to detect the importation of illegal goods and prevent their release into U.S. commerce. Generally, customs agents do not get involved in a transaction until after the merchandise is released and frequently the damage has already been done to U.S. industry by the time their investigation is complete.

We believe the increased manpower at the ports will reduce the burden on customs agents. However, we will continue to review the situation and, if warranted, will consider further changes to improve the effectiveness of the Customs' fraud program.

Mr. DINGELL. Is it the intention of the Ways and Means Committee to encourage the Customs Service to continue its commercial fraud efforts and to increase these efforts where needed?

Mr. GIBBONS. Absolutely. The Ways and Means Committee places a high priority on the effective enforcement of our commercial trade laws. We are very concerned about the devastating impact that counterfeit and other illegal imports are having on U.S. companies, workers, and consumers, and will continue our active oversight role to insure that the Customs Service uses it resources in the most efficient and effective manner to enforce U.S. trade laws and protect American industry from illegal imports.

Mr. DINGELL. It is clear from our hearing record that additional customs agents need to be assigned abroad. As many as 50 may be needed to identify sources of counterfeit goods and investigate the possible violations of our textile, steel, and other agreements. Does the gentleman believe that to be reasonable?

Mr. GIBBONS. Your proposal to assign additional customs agents abroad to identify sources of counterfeit goods and investigate possible violations of U.S. trade law is an excellent one. As I said earlier, the best way to protect U.S. industry from the adverse effects of illegal imports is to discover such violations before the goods are released from Customs' custody. Your proposal would help accomplish this result and substantially increase the effectiveness of the Customs fraud program.

Mr. DINGELL. Given the failure of the Customs Service to maintain any presence in Taiwan, the counterfeiting capital of the world, and most other trouble spots in Southeast Asia, would the gentlemen agree that the Customs Service should maintain an effective presence in Taiwan and other parts of the Third World where transshipment of textiles and apparel in violation of our agreements and active theft of American intellectual property are occurring?

Mr. GIBBONS. Yes; it seems to me that Customs could more effectively enforce U.S. trade laws and protect American industry from counterfeit and other illegal imports by identifying and maintaining an effective presence in those countries where substantial illegal exports to the United States are likely to occur.

Mr. DINGELL. We have found that the management philosophy of the U.S. Customs Service in the utilization of its customs agents emphasizes narcotics and contraband interdiction at the expense of commercial fraud investigations. Only about 118 of Customs' 932 agents now spend most of their time investigating commercial fraud. Given the magnitude of this problem, would the gentlemen agree that the specific assignment of 50 additional agents to special commercial fraud task forces in district offices around the United States, together with sufficient support in the regional offices and in the Customs Fraud Center at headquarters would help Customs to maintain an effective an ongoing presence to deal with these problems?

Mr. GIBBONS. I share your concern about the management philosophy of the U.S. Customs Service which seems to deemphasize the importance of commercial fraud investigations in the Customs mission.

I strongly believe that this shortsighted management philosophy must be changed if we are to see effective Customs' enforcement of our trade laws and I agree that your proposal of creating special commercial fraud task forces would be a step in the right direction. Until this underlying management philosophy of the Customs Service is changed, however, no such program can be completely effective. Through our oversight function, the Committee on Ways and Means, therefore, intends to take a very active role to see that the Commissioner of Customs and the Customs Service change that philosophy and recognize the importance of effective Customs' enforcement of our trade laws to the continued viability of U.S. industry.

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to express my support for H.R. 5188 which authorizes $686.4 million for the U.S. Customs Service.

The flow of counterfeit goods into the United States has reached epidemic proportions. In order to evade U.S. customs laws, illegitimate foreign manufacturers will go to great lengths to smuggle their goods into our lucrative markets. These activities are not merely violations of law. In addition to depriving Americans of their jobs, they deprive U.S. businesses of the capital needed to expand and develop new products. Furthermore, in many instances, such goods can even result in danger to the American consumer.

The Commerce Department announced on Friday that textile and apparel imports totaled a record $4.7 billion for the first 3 months of the year, up 53 percent over the same period for 1983, while exports declined 2 percent to $788 million.

The American Textile Manufacturers Institute has projected that the industry's trade deficit for 1984 could reach $15.5 billion, a 48-percent increase over last year's record $10.6 billion deficit.

As alarming as the import figures may be, they remain but the tip of the iceberg. They represent huge increases despite the bilateral agreements entered into between this country and 26 foreign countries governing the levels of imports of textile products into the United States. These additional imports mean more work for an already overworked Customs Service.

The hearings conducted by the Oversight and Investigation Subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee exposed a number of methods by which textile import fraud is committed, including transshipment to nonquota countries, counterfeiting of textile export visas, false declarations of shipment value or quantity, and outright misrepresentations of textile categories.

The witnesses included a number of import specialists and inspectors with the U.S. Customs Service (USCS). Although these individuals are knowledgeable and dedicated, they lack the resources and authority to move aggressively against import quota violations. The testimony received demonstrated that even when a particular shipment contains illegal goods, there is less than a one in three chance that the shipment can be identified and seized at our border. This is astonishing.

We also learned that the practice of "port shopping" is widespread within the industry. Those seeking to smuggle counterfeit goods or to evade import quotas may shop around for suitable ports within the United States through which to channel their goods. This situation exists because of inadequate staffing, commitments to scrutinize other commodities or through unfamiliarity with textile classifications.

Significant progress has been made in detecting illegal shipments under Operations Tripwire, a commercial fraud investigating unit formed within the U.S. Customs Service. Commercial fraud cases are difficult to investigate, however, and we learned from the Energy and Commerce hearings, criminal and civil penalties are often too lenient or inadequate to provide an effective deterrent to those who wish to evade our trade laws.

We need to bolster the resources available to the U.S. Customs Service in order to provide relief to the hundreds, if not thousands, of American workers whose jobs are placed in jeopardy through fraudulent import practices. This increase in funding in H.R. 5188 will allow the service to hire 450 additional Customs Inspectors, 150 import specialists and 50 patrol officers.

For every dollar the Service spends, it has been estimated that the return is $20. Given the trade problems facing this country, this additional funding is both justified and necessary.●

● Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 5188, the authorization bill for the U.S. International Trade Commission, the U.S. Customs Service, and the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative.

Specifically, my interest in this legislation comes from a region on the international border and my position as chairman of the Congressional Border Caucus. I commend the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Trade for recognizing the shortcomings of the administration's budget proposals for fiscal year 1985, in which funding for personnel in the Customs Service was severely cut, and the customs air interdiction program, the border's last line of defense in the war on drugs in the air, was practically eliminated.

In fiscal year 1984, the administration reduced the personnel of the U.S. Customs Service by 2,000 positions. Fortunately in a compromise between the House and the Senate, that reduction was scaled back to only 400 positions. This bill would not only reestablish the lost 400 positions but would also provide the authority for an additional 250 positions. This measure is needed not only to continue current service levels which Customs must provide but to also match the increase in border traffic and activity. Furthermore, faced with a devastating economy in our region, border area businesses cannot afford delays in transfers of goods and services between our Nation's border due to the lack of adequate personnel. This impedes our Nation's productivity and economy as a whole.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the section of the bill which deals with the consideration of the consolidation of border inspection activities between the Customs Service, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Although the committee praised the administration for proposing such a consolidation of passenger clearance in order to strengthen law enforcement and provide cost efficiency and budgetary savings, the committee should carefully monitor such a move. This is more than a steamlining of the primary inspection functions of the Federal Government. While the committee reasserts its commitment to the jurisdiction of the Customs Service in the area of inspection and clearance of commercial importations at all ports, it should be wary of any administration attempts which could be construed as simple consolidations but in actuality are attempts to reorganize the Government in a way to merge the Customs Service with the Immigration and Naturalization Service, two very different agencies, with two very different functions and missions.●

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. GIBBONS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5188, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 5, rule I, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

SEC. 10. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There are authorized to be appropriated for fiscal years after fiscal year 1984 such sums as may be necessary to carry out this Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PEASE). Is a second demanded?

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX).

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is H.R. 5147, the Eastern Pacific Tuna Licensing Act of 1984 which was reported unanimously by our committee on April 4, 1984. Briefly stated, the Eastern Pacific Ocean Tuna Fishing Agreement, which this legislation implements, is the latest international agreement through which the United States has manifested its consistent position that tuna, because of their highly migratory nature, can only be effectively managed and conserved through regional, international cooperation.

From 1950 to 1978, the tuna fisheries in the eastern Pacific region were successfully managed under the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission (IATTC) despite the fact that several parties to the Commission held markedly different positions regarding the juridical status of the resource. During the early 1970's, however, these differing views, in combination with the rapid emergence of 200-mile fishery conservation zones and the development of more sophisticated tuna fleets, led to a desire to replace the IATTC with a new convention.

When renegotiation efforts became completely deadlocked in 1980, Mexico and Costa Rica, which claimed coastal state competence to unilaterally manage tuna within their resource zones, began to enforce their claimed jurisdiction. The resulting seizures of U.S. tuna vessels led the United States to impose a moratorium on the imports of tuna from these nations in 1980.

The Reagan administration made the negotiation of a new agreement a high priority during 1981 and 1982. Although the negotiations did not involve Mexico, Costa Rica fully participated and during that period ceased its active seizure of U.S. tuna vessels. On November 12, 1982, an ad referendum agreement with Costa Rica was achieved and consequently, in February 1983, the embargo of that nation's tuna products was discontinued.

On March 15, 1983, the United States and Costa Rica and Panama signed the Eastern Pacific Tuna Fishing Agreement in San Jose, Costa Rica. Since that time, Guatemala and Honduras have signed the accord. The inclusion of other Central and South American countries is being sought by the State Department.

Briefly, the agreement creates an international authority to issue regional licenses for fishing tuna in a broad area of the eastern Pacific Ocean. License fees are to be distributed among the participating coastal states in proportion to the amount of tuna taken within 200 miles of each party's coast. These fees will also be used to pay for the international administration of the agreement. The agreement also contains provisions for the adoption of conservation recommendations when all significant tuna fishing nations become parties and a comprehensive convention is eventually concluded.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to note that the agreement does not compromise the juridical positions of any party and represents an equitable balance between the interests of the coastal States and distant-water fishing nations. It thus furthers U.S. fisheries policy objectives while reducing tensions that have arisen as a result of conflicting juridical claims. As such, the new agreement should end the cycle of seizures of U.S. tuna vessels and the subsequent imposition of retaliatory U.S. embargoes on foreign imports. The Senate gave its consent to ratify the agreement by a vote of 100 to 0 on July 27, 1983, and the agreement was ratified by the United States on September 6, 1983, by President Reagan. I, therefore, strongly recommend that the House favorably consider this legislation which merely implements this agreement for the United States.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my support of H.R. 5147, a bill to implement the Eastern Pacific Ocean Tuna Fishing Agreement.

The agreement was signed on March 15, 1983, by the United States, Costa Rica, and Panama, and subsequently by Guatemala and Honduras. It will enter into force when signed and ratified by five coastal states of the eastern Pacific region. Upon entry into force, the Council established by the agreement will make available international licenses to fish tuna in the agreement area. License fees will be disbursed among the coastal state parties to the agreement in proportion to the catches of tuna in their respective 200-mile zones. Fees will also be used to pay for administration of the agreement. When all major tuna fishing nations become parties to this agreement, the Council can adopt conservation recommendations to be based on studies provided by the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission (IATTC). After this regime is established, the IATTC will be superseded.

Most nations along the coast of the eastern Pacific Ocean claim sovereign rights over tuna in their 200-mile zones. However, in accordance with the Fishery Conservation and Management Act (FCMA), and the Presidential proclamation of March 10, 1983, establishing the U.S. exclusive economic zone, the United States does not claim or recognize coastal state sovereign rights or jurisdiction over migratory tuna beyond 12 miles from the coasts. The United States maintains that this resource can be managed effectively only by international agreement, not by the unilateral actions of coastal states.

The agreement does not compromise the formal juridical positions of the United States or the other parties. It represents an equitable balance between the interests of coastal states and distant-water fishing nations. Thus, the agreement can serve as a model for regional tuna licensing agreements in other areas of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting H.R. 5147.

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5147, is the implementing legislation for the recently concluded and ratified Eastern Pacific Ocean Tuna Fishing Agreement, signed in San Jose, Costa Rica, March 15, 1983. This agreement has been signed by the countries of Guatemala, Honduras, Panama, Costa Rica, and the United States. This international agreement stems from the unsatisfactory status of the Inter-American Tropical Tuna Agreement which has been plagued by discord among the participating nations. The successful implementation of this agreement will buttress the longstanding U.S. position that tuna can only be managed effectively by international accord.

This legislation is supported by the administration and, to my knowledge, is noncontroversial. It merely implements and authorizes appropriations for U.S. participation in this international tuna management regime.

The Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee reported this bill by unanimous voice vote.

I strongly support this effort to resolve some of the difficulties facing our tuna industry and urge my colleagues to pass H.R. 5147.●

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4147, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 5 of rule I and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the legislation just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

OFFICE OF ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY AND COUNCIL ON ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY AUTHORIZATIONS, FISCAL YEARS 1985, 1986, AND 1987

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4585) to authorize appropriations for the Office of Environmental Quality and the Council on Environmental Quality for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 4585

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 205 of the Environmental Quality Improvement Act of 1970 (42 U.S.C. 4374(c)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(d) $480,000 for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1985, 1986, and 1987".

SEC. 2. The Environmental Quality Improvement Act of 1970 (42 U.S.C. 4371–4374) is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"OFFICE MANAGEMENT FUND

"SEC. 206. (a) There is established an Office of Environmental Quality Management Fund (hereinafter referred to as the 'Fund') to receive advance payments from other agencies or accounts that may be used solely to finance—

"(1) study contracts that are jointly sponsored by the Office and one or more other Federal agencies; and

"(2) Federal interagency environmental projects (including task forces) in which the Office participates.

"(b) Any study contract or project that is to be financed under subsection (a) may be initiated only with the approval of the Director.

"(c) The Director shall promulgate regulations setting forth policies and procedures for operation of the Fund."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX).

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4585 is a bill which authorizes appropriations for the Office of Environmental Quality for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987. The Council on Environmental Quality (CEQ) was created by the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) in 1969. The Council, which operates within the Executive Office of the President, consists of three members. The Council members are responsible for advising the President on environmental matters, monitoring the status of the environment, reviewing Federal programs and policies for consistency with NEPA, and providing information to the public on environmental matters. The Council has a continuing authorization of $1 million annually under NEPA.

In 1970, the Environmental Quality Improvement Act established the Office of Environmental Quality (OEQ). The Office consists of staff personnel, currently numbering seven full-time employees, who provide support and advice to the Council. The existing authorization for the Office of Environmental Quality expires at the end of fiscal year 1984.

A hearing was held by the Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment on February 2, 1984, in regard to the performance and funding requirements of CEQ and its OEQ support staff. On April 11, 1984, H.R. 4585 was reported by the full Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

H.R. 4585 would provide an authorization level of $480,000 annually for fiscal years 1985 through 1987 for operation of the Office of Environmental Quality. This authorization, together with the continuing $1 million annual authorization for the Council, would provide an authorized annual funding level for the Council and their staff of $1.48 million for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987. In addition, H.R. 4585 would create a management fund to finance joint studies and projects involving the Council on Environmental Quality and other entities. This fund, which would replace the current consolidated working fund, would provide greater accountability to the Congress and OMB. Creation of this fund is supported by both the administration and by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Council on Environmental Quality and their staff have served an important function in advising the President and White House staff on environmental issues. I encourage the administration to take greater advantage of the Council's potential contributions in the future. I am confident that the members will continue to support the role of the Council on Environmental Quality through this reauthorization legislation.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4585 reauthorizes the Environmental Quality Improvement Act by providing $480,000 for each of fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987. The Environmental Quality Improvement Act established the Office of Environmental Quality to provide professional and administrative staff and support for the Council on Environmental Quality. I believe that the reauthorization will, in conjunction with the $1 million permanent authorization for the Council on Environmental Quality, provide the funding levels necessary to carry out the congressionally mandated duties of the Council.

H.R. 4585 also establishes an Office of Environmental Quality Management Fund to be used to finance jointly funded study contracts and interagency environmental projects in which the Office participates. The establishment of this fund will provide improved accountability for the funding of these types of projects.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting this legislation.

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us today is H.R. 4585, a reauthorization of appropriations for the Office of Environmental Quality (OEQ) which is an adjunct of the Council of Environmental Quality (CEQ).

This legislation reauthorizes OEQ at the rate of $480,000, per year through fiscal year 1987, and also establishes an Office of Environmental Quality Management Fund. The increased authorization and management fund were requested by the administration. The $480,000 is in addition to the continuing appropriation for CEQ in the amount of $1 million annually contained in the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 (NEPA).

CEQ was created by NEPA for the purposes of advising the President on environmental issues, reviewing Federal programs for consistency with the standards of NEPA, and monitoring the status of the environment. OEQ was created by the Environmental Quality Improvement Act to provide staff and support for the Council.

The Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee reported this measure, as amended, by a unanimous-voice vote.

I urge my colleagues to pass H.R. 4585, so that CEQ can continue its important role as overseer of the National Environmental Policy Act and counselor to the President on environmental issues.●

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4585, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 5 of rule I, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

DESIGNATION OF EDWIN B. FORSYTHE NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 537) designating the Brigantine and Barnegat units of the National Wildlife Refuge System as the Edwin B. Forsythe National Wildlife Refuge.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.J. RES. 537

Whereas, Congressman Edwin B. Forsythe, in his role as Ranking Minority Member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment, was an outstanding leader for conservation of our natural resources and protection of our Nation's natural beauty;

Whereas, during his career he played a critical role in such important natural resource legislation such as the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972, the Endangered Species Act of 1973, and the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976;

Whereas, he was the major Congressional sponsor of the Nongame Wildlife Act, which increased public interest and concern for species of wildlife not subject to taking for sport;

Whereas, throughout his Congressional career, he was a strong defender of the National Wildlife Refuge System;

Whereas, he had a deep affection for the coastal wildlife refuges in his home State of New Jersey: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Brigantine National Wildlife Refuge and the Barnegat National Wildlife Refuge in the State of New Jersey shall hereafter be collectively named and designated as the "Edwin B. Forsythe National Wildlife Refuge". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to either of such refuges shall be held to be a reference to the "Edwin B. Forsythe National Wildlife Refuge".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX).

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, on March 29, 1984, we lost a good friend and colleague in Ed Forsythe of New Jersey. Ed served for 13 years with great distinction and will be remembered by all of us for his kindness, his quiet but effective work on legislation, and the dignity and sense of decency he brought to all of his endeavors.

A dairy farmer and small town businessman, he began his government career in 1948 as secretary of the Moorestown, N.J., Board of Adjustment. He was elected to the Moorestown Township Committee in 1953 and served as mayor from 1957 to 1962 when he became chairman of the township planning board, a post he held through 1963. He was elected to the New Jersey Senate in 1964, where he became in succession, assistant minority leader, minority leader, senate president and president pro tempore. One of his many accomplishments in the Senate was sponsorship and passage of legislation creating a statewide grand jury, which for the first time gave State law enforcement officials the tools to adequately pursue and prosecute organized crime and official corruption. He was first elected to Congress on November 2, 1970, to fill the unexpired term of Hon. William T. Cahill in the 91st Congress and a full 2-year term in the 92d Congress.

Ed was ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee from the 94th Congress on. He was a strong and effective voice for natural resource legislation during his tenure on the committee, playing a critical role in the passage of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act, the Endangered Species Act, and the Marine Mammal Protection Act. He was the prime author of the Nongame Act, which has increased the attention given the many species of wildlife in this country that are not hunted.

In January 1983, he became ranking minority member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. In addition to his role as ranking minority member of the committee and subcommittee, he also served as a member of the Standards of Official Conduct Committee, the Republican Committee on Committees, and the Republican Personnel Committee.

This joint resolution would name the Brigantine and Barnegat Refuges in New Jersey for Ed Forsythe. He was always a strong supporter of the National Wildlife Refuge System and had a deep affection for the refuges in his home State. It was cosponsored by my good friend and colleague from New Jersey, Mr. HUGHES, in whose district the refuge is located, along with the entire New Jersey delegation and the entire membership of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, as well as a number of other Members.

I would like the record to include the list of names of all of the cosponsors of the legislation. Along with myself and Mr. HUGHES, they include: Mr. JONES of North Carolina, Mr. SNYDER, Mr. FLORIO, Mr. HOWARD, Mr. SMITH of New Jersey, Mrs. ROUKEMA, Mr. DWYER of New Jersey, Mr. RINALDO, Mr. ROE, Mr. TORRICELLI, Mr. RODINO, Mr. MINISH, Mr. COURTER, Mr. GUARINI, Mr. BOSCO, Mr. SUNIA, Mr. MCKERNAN, Mr. TALLON, Mr. YOUNG of Alaska, Mr. THOMAS of Georgia, Mr. ORTIZ, Mr. CARPER, Mr. FRANKLIN, Mr. PRITCHARD, Mrs. SCHNEIDER, Mr. LENT, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. CARNEY, Mr. SHUMWAY, Mr. FIELDS, Mr. SAWYER, Mr. BATEMAN, Mr. DE LUGO, Mr. MURPHY, Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama, Mr. PANETTA, Mr. LOWERY of California, Mr. HOYER, Mr. WAXMAN, Mr. HUTTO, Mr. HERTEL of Michigan, Mr. WOLF, Mr. TAUZIN, Mr. VANDERGRIFF, Mr. DIXON, Mr. WILSON, Mr. CORRADA, Mr. BEREUTER, Mr. CHAPPELL, Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. CROCKETT, Mr. FAZIO, Mr. FROST, Mr. KINDNESS, Mr. WOLPE, Mr. FUQUA, Mr. LOEFFLER, Mr. FRENZEL, Mr. MADIGAN, Mr. PORTER, Mr. RATCHFORD, Mr. CHENEY, Mr. HUBBARD, Mr. BIAGGI, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. D'AMOURS, Mr. OBERSTAR, Mr. DYSON, Mr. STUDDS, Mrs. BOXER, Mr. FISH, Mr. DEWINE, Mr. DE LA GARZA, Mr. HAYES, Mr. LIPINSKI, Mr. BORSKI, Mr. OWENS, Mr. MCGRATH, Mrs. BOGGS, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. DAUB, Mr. WON PAT, Mr. FOGLIETTA, and Mr. SHAW.

Mr. Speaker, I can think of no more appropriate tribute to our friend nor one that he would have appreciated more. I urge the passage of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) has consumed 5 minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to echo the words just spoken of the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX).

Mr. Speaker, Ed Forsythe served in the House of Representatives for almost 14 years. Although a quiet and gentle person, Ed was able to forge consensus on nearly every issue in which he was actively involved. His contribution to the protection of our Nation's fish and wildlife resources and environmental quality have been numerous and will be longstanding.

Since his death on March 29 of this year, the many kind remarks of his colleagues and others who have dealt with Ed here in the U.S. Congress and in his home State of New Jersey have, in a small way, eased the sadness felt by his family, friends, and staff.

House Joint Resolution 537 which renames the Barnegat and Brigantine National Wildlife Refuges after Edwin B. Forsythe is an especially fitting tribute to the man and his work. A strong supporter of the national wildlife refuge system in general, Ed had a particular fondness for these two important units on the Atlantic flyway. The renaming of these units will provide a constant reminder of his contributions.

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 537, legislation which will rename two units of the national wildlife refuge system to honor a great statesman who died on March 29, 1984, Congressman Ed Forsythe.

He served in the House with great distinction for 13 years, and will be remembered by all for his leadership in environmental legislation.

Naming this refuge after him is a uniquely fitting tribute and one which I believe he would have greatly appreciated.

I strongly urge all the Members of the House of Representatives to vote for passage of this legislation.●

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 537, to designate the Brigantine and Barnegat units of the national wildlife refuge system as the Edwin B. Forsythe National Wildlife Refuge. Indeed, this is a most fitting tribute to our dear friend and colleague, Ed Forsythe, who was a tireless supporter of efforts to improve our national wildlife refuge system.

Ed Forsythe has been an inspiration to all of us in his efforts to promote an effective policy for the conservation of our natural resources and protection of our Nation's natural beauty. As this resolution underscores, he had a deep affection for the coastal wildlife refuges in his home State of New Jersey. Therefore, it is fitting and proper that this body recognizes his dedication to this Nation's precious natural resources, and designate the Brigantine and Barnegat National Wildlife Refuges in the State of New Jersey as the "Edwin B. Forsythe National Wildlife Refuge."●

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) that the House suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution, House Joint Resolution 537.

The question was taken.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 5 of rule I and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolution just under consideration.

There was no objection.

ADDITIONS TO BON SECOUR NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 4921) to provide for the selection of additional lands for inclusion within the Bon Secour National Wildlife Refuge, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 4921

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act entitled "An Act to establish the Bon Secour National Wildlife Refuge", approved June 9, 1980 (16 U.S.C. 668dd note), is amended—

(1) by amending section 2 by redesignating paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) as paragraphs (2), (3), and (4), respectively, and by inserting before paragraph (2) (as so redesignated) the following new paragraph:

"(1) the term 'additional selection area' means those lands and waters in Baldwin County, Alabama, depicted on the map entitled 'Proposed Addition to the Bon Secour National Wildlife Refuge' dated February 1984 and on file at the United States Fish and Wildlife Service."; and

(2) by amending section 3—

(A) by amending that portion of such section that precedes subsection (a)(2) to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. (a) SELECTION.—(1) The Secretary shall—

"(A) within one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, designate approximately ten thousand acres of land and water within the selection area as land which the Secretary considers appropriate for the refuge; and

"(B) within six months after the date of the enactment of the 1984 amendment to this subsection—

"(i) designate approximately two thousand acres of land and water within the additional selection area as land which the Secretary considers appropriate for the refuge, and

(ii) publish in the Federal Register a detailed map depicting the boundaries of the land designated under subparagraphs (A) and (B)(i), which map shall be on file and available for public inspection at the offices of the United States Fish and Wildlife Service.";

(B) by amending subsection (a)(2) by striking out "designated under paragraph (1)(B)" and inserting in lieu thereof "depicted under paragraph (1)(B)(ii)"; and

(C) by amending subsection (b) by striking out "designated under subsection (a)(1)(B)" and inserting in lieu thereof "depicted under subsection (a)(1)(B)(ii)".

SEC. 2. (a) Section 8(a) of the Act of September 2, 1937 (commonly known as the Federal Aid in Wildlife Restoration Act, 16 U.S.C. 669g-1) is amended—

(1) by inserting "the Governor of American Samoa," immediately after "the Governor of Guam,";

(2) by inserting "American Samoa," immediately after "Puerto Rico, Guam," each place it appears therein; and

(3) by inserting "for American Samoa one-sixth of one per centum," immediately after "for Guam one-sixth of one per centum,".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) shall take effect October 1, 1984.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX).

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4921 would provide for the inclusion of an additional tract of land within the Bon Secour National Wildlife Refuge. It would also make American Samoa eligible for grants from the Federal aid in wildlife restoration program.

The Bon Secour Refuge, which was authorized by Congress in 1980, is located in Alabama at the mouth of Mobile Bay. At present, the authorized refuge consists of four separate units totaling approximately 10,000 acres. These areas contain some of the best remaining undisturbed beach ecosystems along the gulf coast and provide habitat for a broad diversity of wildlife species. The refuge is the last major stopping point for migratory birds of the Atlantic and Mississippi flyways before their migration to the Yucatan Peninsula.

The proposed legislation would simply add another unit consisting of approximately 2,000 acres to the refuge. The new unit is primarily wetlands and contains extremely important bird habitat. The Nature Conservancy has an option on approximately 800 of the 2,000 acres and we understand the other landowners have also demonstrated some interest in selling their land.

Mr. Speaker, we have not increased the authorization of appropriations for acquisition of this refuge. There is a proposal pending at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration for the designation of one of the units Skunk Bayou, as an estuarine sanctuary. If this designation occurs, there is a likelihood that the unit could be protected without acquisition. If and when designation of Skunk Bayou as an estuarine sanctuary occurs, we will consider deauthorizing the acquisition of the area and redesignating the boundaries accordingly.

The second section of the bill is an amendment to the Federal Aid in Wildlife Restoration Act. This act, known popularly as Pittman-Robertson, or P-R, established a program to provide grants to States for wildlife restoration projects. The program is entirely self-supporting, funded by an excise tax on arms and ammunition, including bows and arrows. The funds are allocated among the States on the basis of a formula which takes into account area and number of hunting licenses sold. A special section provides for an allocation to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands. This legislation would make American Samoa eligible for the same share as is currently available to Guam and the Virgin Islands.

As the Members can see, this is a noncontroversial piece of legislation and we urge its adoption.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4921.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4921 would provide for the inclusion of an additional 2,000 acres within the Bon Secour National Wildlife Refuge.

The Bon Secour Refuge is located at the mouth of Mobile Bay in Alabama and presently consists of four separate units of about 10,000 acres total. The proposed addition is primarily wetlands and its protection would be of major benefit to the migratory waterfowl of the Atlantic and Mississippi Flyways on their migration routes to the Yucatan Peninsula.

Also contained in H.R. 4921 is a minor amendment to the Federal Aid in Wildlife Restoration Act, known popularly as the Pittman-Robertson Act. The change would make American Samoa eligible for the same share of matching grants as is currently available to Guam and the Virgin Islands for wildlife restoration projects.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join with me in support of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to compliment the gentleman from American Samoa, Mr. FOFO SUNIA, for his wisdom in getting his area recognized in this legislation. I had the privilege of traveling to his district 3 years ago. It is a unique area, and he is a valued member of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. EDWARDS).

Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the bill.

I introduced H.R. 4921 to expand the boundaries of the Bon Secour National Wildlife Refuge by adding approximately 2,000 acres to the system. This addition is not expected to entail any further costs for land acquisition since comparable property presently authorized for the refuge should go into an estuarine sanctuary to be administered by the State of Alabama. My bill does not authorize additional appropriations.

The Bon Secour National Wildlife Refuge was created when legislation I introduced was enacted in 1980. To date, approximately 2,500 acres have been purchased by the Fish and Wildlife Service. A large portion of this property is located in Baldwin County, Ala., where development in recent years has been phenomenal. Many of my constituents who are not particularly concerned with environmental issues or wildlife preservation have expressed gratitude for this effort to set aside this valuable resource to partially offset the building boom in the area.

I introduced this bill to modify the refuge boundaries to allow the incorporation of a new Sand Bayou tract in the area of Oyster Bay. The tract has been studied by the Fish and Wildlife Service and found to be eminently qualified for inclusion in the system. The tract supports a wide variety of wildlife species, including a number of endangered or threatened species, and its marsh areas are important spawning grounds for shrimp and crabs which have a major economic impact for commercial fishermen in the area. A large portion of the Sand Bayou tract is available from willing sellers. It is my intent, and the legislative history should show, that property within the refuge and within this tract should be acquired from willing sellers only.

The original Bon Secour Wildlife Refuge authorization provided for the acquisition of a 10,000-acre refuge. Four separate tracts were established. One of those tracts, the Skunk Bayou tract on Mobile Bay in Baldwin County, is now proposed for inclusion in the National Estuarine Sanctuary System. The State of Alabama has made application to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration for the estuarine sanctuary and it is anticipated that funding will be approved in fiscal year 1984. It is my desire, and I believe the committee agrees, that the Skunk Bayou tract be deauthorized from the wildlife refuge system once its estuarine sanctuary status has been accomplished. The deletion of the Skunk Bayou tract will allow the refuge to be maintained at approximately 10,000 acres and will make the refuge more manageable while increasing its wildlife value.

I urge adoption of this bill.

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4921, the legislation we are considering today under suspension of the rules, will extend the Bon Secour National Wildlife Refuge to include an additional 2,000 acres with no additional authorization for appropriation.

An area within the present refuge boundaries, which is comparable to the addition proposed in H.R. 4921, has been proposed by the State of Alabama as an estuarine sanctuary. If and when that proposal becomes final, I feel it would be appropriate to deauthorize the purchase of that area since it would be protected by the State. At that time, it would also be appropriate for the Secretary of the Interior to redesignate the boundaries of the refuge to exclude the State estuarine sanctuary.

H.R. 4921 would also include American Samoa, which was established as a territory in 1900, in the list of States and territories eligible for a percentage of funds under the Federal Aid in Wildlife Restoration Act, commonly called the Pittman-Robertson Act of 1937. American Samoa was inadvertently excluded from this act and will now be eligible to receive one-sixth of 1 percent of the available Pittman-Robertson funds annually. For 1983, the latest figures available, this would have amounted to approximately $147,000.

I strongly support this bill and urge its adoption by the House of Representatives.●

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX), that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4921, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

The title was amended so as to read "A bill to provide for the selection of additional lands for inclusion within the Bon Secour National Wildlife Refuge and for other purposes.".

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who wish to do so may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5051) to give permanent effect to the provisions of the Fishermen's Protective Act of 1967 relating to the reimbursement of U.S. commercial fishermen for certain losses incurred incident to the seizure of their vessels by foreign nations, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5051

(2) by amending subsection (b)—

(A) by inserting "determination and" immediately before "certification" in the first sentence thereof, and

(B) by striking out "the Treasury" in the second and third sentences and inserting in lieu thereof "State".

(b) Section 5(a)(1)(A) of such Act of 1967 (22 U.S.C. 1975(a)(1)(A)) is amended by striking out "the Secretary of the Treasury" and inserting in lieu thereof "him".

(c) The first sentence of section 9 of such Act of 1967 (22 U.S.C. 1979) is amended by striking out "Secretary of the Treasury" and inserting in lieu thereof "Secretary of the State"; and by striking out "certified to him by the Secretary of State" and inserting in lieu thereof "determined and certified by him".

SEC. 3. (a) Section 2 of the Fishermen's Protective Act of 1967 (22 U.S.C. 1972) is amended—

(1) by amending paragraph (1) to read as follows:

"(1) any vessel of the United States is seized by a foreign country on the basis of claims to jurisdiction that are not recognized by the United States, or on the basis of claims to jurisdiction recognized by the United States but exercised in a manner inconsistent with international law as recognized by the United States;"; and

(2) by amending the matter appearing between subparagraph (D) and clause (i) of paragraph (2) to read as follows:

"the Secretary of State, unless there is clear and convincing credible evidence that the seizure did not meet the requirements under paragraph (1) or (2), as the case may be, shall immediately take such steps as are necessary—".

(b) Section 4 of such Act of 1967 (22 U.S.C. 1974) is amended by striking out "any fishery convention or treaty to which the United States is a party." and inserting in lieu thereof "any applicable convention or treaty, if that treaty or convention was made with advice and consent of the Senate and was in force and effect for the United States and the seizing country at the time of the seizure.".

(c) The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) apply with respect to seizures made after April 1, 1983, by foreign countries of vessels of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alaska (Mr. YOUNG) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX).

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the bill presently before the House is H.R. 5051, which makes permanent the authorization of appropriations for the distant water fishing industry vessel seizure insurance program under section 7 of the Fishermen's Protection Act of 1967 (FPA). Testimony in support of the bill was received from the administration on March 20, 1984. Perhaps remarkably, considering the administration's view of a number of other programs we have established, NMFS testimony reveals that we have, at least in this program, devised a user-fee concept that the administration supports.

For the benefit of the Members who are not familiar with this program, section 7 of the FPA provides direct compensation to American vessel owners and crews for financial losses resulting from seizures of their vessels by foreign governments on the basis of jurisdictional claims not recognized by the U.S. Government. Losses payable under section 7 are limited to: First, the market value of fish caught before seizure if they are spoiled or confiscated; second, up to 50 percent of gross income lost as a direct result of such seizures; and third, actual costs, other than those covered by section 3 of the FPA incurred by an owner during seizure and detention. Section 3, which is currently a permanent authorization, covers fines, license fees, registration fees, or any other direct charge paid to secure the release of the vessel and crew.

For the past several years, all money necessary to fund this program has come from direct industry fees in the form of insurance agreements voluntarily entered into with the Secretary of Commerce. As the administration testified, this important program provides the dual purpose of supporting "U.S. positions on international law and the continued economic viability of the U.S. distant water fishing fleets."

During our full committee markup on April 11 an amendment was adopted to provide clarifications to the law that we deemed in order to reflect relatively recent changes in international law that spell the need for "modernizing" the statute. In addition, the administration proposed "housekeeping" amendments that were adopted.

Briefly, the amendments adopted by the committee added a new section 2 to the bill, reflecting the desire of the administration to constitute in one agency, the Department of State, the procedure for certification and payment of claims pursuant to section 3 of the Fishermen's Protective Act. Under the current system, the Secretary of State certifies the amount of payment due a vessel owner in order to cover any fine, license fee, registration fee or other direct charge paid in order to secure the prompt release of the vessel and crew. This certification is transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury who then pays the certified amount. The administration, I believe, correctly perceives this process as so much unnecessary paperwork and has requested our support in consolidating the ministerial functions of the Secretary of the Treasury with the more direct programmatic responsibilities of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker, to fully understand the amendments to the Fishermen's Protective Act contained in the new section 3 to H.R. 5051, allow me to provide the House with some useful background information.

It is to be recalled that the basic purpose of the FPA is to provide prompt and fair reimbursement for certain costs resulting from illegal seizures of U.S. fishing vessels by foreign nations. This reflects a sound policy that furthers our vital national interest in the preservation, and continued exercise by our citizens, of the rights and freedoms of the United States under international law. The FPA represents a recognition of the fact that the legal, political, and economic costs to the United States will be severe if our distant water fisherman are not guaranteed the support of their Government in carrying out their lawful pursuits in the oceans.

Since the enactment of the FPA in 1967, international oceans law has become increasingly complex, and the points of potential conflict and controversy have multiplied. Indeed, it is remarkable that the problems that we have encountered have not been more numerous and more serious. As international rules have become more complicated and international relations more sophisticated, the process of determining when reimbursement is due under the FPA as a result of foreign seizures of U.S. vessels has become more difficult, and the basic policy of the act has not always been served. The standards and criteria for determining when reimbursement is appropriate should be clarified, so that changed circumstances do not stimulate inappropriate interpretations of the FPA that could defeat its purpose.

Section 3(a)(1) for the bill, as added by the amendment adopted by our committee, provides for a technical amendment of section 2 of the FPA. For the purpose intended by the FPA, the reference to territorial waters and high seas is, in modern international law, too simplistic and invites a misapplication of the act. For example, there is no reference to the exclusive economic zone (EEZ), which is a form of maritime jurisdiction that has emerged in the practice of States only recently, but is already well settled in international law. The EEZ is neither an area in territorial waters, nor strictly speaking, an area of the high seas. However, for nonresource related purposes, coastal States must guarantee high seas freedoms of navigation, overflight and the laying and maintenance of submarine cables and pipelines, as the President's March 10, 1983, proclamation establishing the U.S. EEZ, and his accompanying oceans policy statement, make clear. Although the existing reference to high seas in the FPA should be interpreted to include the EEZ, a clarification is in order.

Nevertheless, an explicit reference to the EEZ in a provision referring also to the high seas would be potentially misleading, insofar as that wording could create the incorrect impression that the EEZ does not have the attributes of the high seas for such purposes as navigation. Therefore, the proposed amendment simply refers to "claims to jurisdiction," a term which encompasses territorial waters, exclusive economic zones and the high seas among other things.

It is also worth noting that there are certain claims to maritime jurisdiction that are of a different character from territorial waters, the EEZ, and high seas, but are within the ambit of the act, even as it is currently worded. For example, hot pursuit is an exceptional claim to jurisdiction by one state over the vessel of another state under defined circumstances, and in accordance with certain specific rules. The general rule is, of course, that the flag-state has exclusive jurisdiction over its vessels.

To clarify this point, the amendment adopted by our committee, also stipulates that reimbursement should be made, not only when seizures occur on the basis of claims that are not recognized by the United States, but also with respect to claims to jurisdiction that are recognized by the United States but which are exercised in a manner inconsistent with international law as the United States views it. For example, on December 5, 1983, Mexico claimed hot pursuit when attempting to justify the seizures of the U.S. fishing vessels, Santa Monica and Miss Charmaine, by a Mexican warship and gunboat in the U.S. EEZ. As a general proposition, hot pursuit by a foreign warship of a U.S. vessel in the U.S. EEZ is regarded by the United States to be lawful. However, in that particular case, there is substantial evidence indicating that the exercise was not in accordance with established international law. Although international rules require, among other things, that hot pursuit be commenced when the pursued vessels are within the maritime jurisdiction of the pursuing vessels, it appears that the Mexican action may well have commenced when the Santa Monica and Miss Charmaine were in the U.S. EEZ.

It is important to emphasize that these proposed amendments to section 2 of the act simply provide useful clarifications.

It should be further noted that the new section 3(a)(2) of the bill would further amend section 2 of the FPA to assure that the Department of State would not be able to accept, practically out of hand, the representations of foreign governments or other interested parties as to material facts, with the view to making a case for the legality of seizures of U.S. vessels. Under the current provisions of the FPA, even when the evidence shows persuasively that a seizure was unlawful, such representations can give rise to "a dispute as to material facts" that will prevent reimbursement, or delay it indefinitely.

It is all too obvious that foreign governments may seek to present seizures in a light that would deny compensation to U.S. fishermen under the FPA. Other parties have their own motives. The proposed amendment clarifies the act to protect the validity of claims for reimbursement that are not challenged by "clear and convincing credible evidence."

Section 3(b) of the bill would amend section 4 of the FPA. The existing language of the act could be misinterpreted to suggest that reimbursement is unavailable, when a seizure is carried out in accordance with a fishery convention or treaty to which the United States is a party, but which has not been ratified by the President upon Senate advice and consent, or is not in force. The amendment would make clear that the bar to reimbursement in this section of the act would extend only to seizures undertaken in accordance with applicable conventions or treaties that have been approved by the Senate, been ratified by the President, and have entered into force. The policy of the Congress in the FPA should not be open to the possibility of frustration by executive agreements, as a result of a lack of clarity under existing provisions of the act.

Finally, section 3(c) of the bill, as proposed in the amendment, makes these clarifying amendments applicable to seizures occurring after April 1, 1983, of U.S. vessels by foreign governments.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I would only request the Members support for this important piece of legislation.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the United States has never asserted or recognized unilateral coastal State jurisdiction over highly migratory species of tuna beyond 12 miles from the coast. The consistent U.S. position, in both domestic and international negotiations, has been that tuna, because of their highly migratory nature, can only be effectively managed and conserved through regional international cooperation. The effective implementation of this policy requires that the United States be in a position to support U.S. fishing vessels operating in accordance with that policy.

Consistent with the U.S. position on this matter, the United States has participated in a number of fishery commissions which regulate tuna on an international basis. The United States has also ratified the Eastern Pacific Ocean Tuna Fishing Agreement, which establishes an international regime for tuna fishing in the eastern Pacific Ocean, including, upon entry into force of the agreement, and international authority to issue regional licenses for tuna fishing in a broad area of the eastern Pacific Ocean. However, without a continuation of U.S. policy with respect to highly migratory species, the international rights recognized by the United States and the continued development of the American distant water fishing industry will suffer.

Reauthorization of this act, and the acceptance of the amendments reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, will be a positive contribution to the maintenance and development of the domestic fishing industry. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting H.R. 5051.

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, H.R. 5051, would make permanent section 7 of the Fishermen's Protective Act (FPA). This act provides a voluntary insurance program to reimburse U.S. commercial fishermen for losses incurred incident to the seizure of U.S. fishing vessels by foreign nations.

Losses covered under section 7 of the FPA include: Damage or destruction of vessels and gear, the market value of any fish seized or which spoil as a result of detention, and up to 50 percent of the estimated loss of gross income to the vessel owner and crew.

The circumstances under which such coverage would apply include seizures by a foreign nation as a result of: Exerting claims not recognized by the United States, restrictions not relating to fishery conservation and management, failure to take into account traditional fishing practices of the United States, fishing conditions and restrictions more onerous than those of the United States, and denial of equitable access to fishery resources by U.S. vessels.

The insurance program carried out under section 7 of the FPA appears to have been carried out efficiently and responsibly since its inception in 1968. The fishing industry has contributed nearly 70 percent of all the funds disbursed via this program.

In addition to the reauthorization, the committee adopted some technical amendments to the act requested by the administration and updated certain terms used in the act. It also clarified the basis on which claims may be paid, the need for clear and convincing evidence to challenge such claims, and added a requirement that conventions or treaties referred to in section 4 of the act must have been ratified by the President on the advice and consent of the Senate and actually be in force before they could be used as a bar to reimbursement.

The Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee ordered this bill reported, as amended, by a unanimous voice vote on April 11, 1984.

I urge my colleagues to pass H.R. 5051, to continue this program which provides much-needed protection for our fishermen.●
